

This is America #199: Antifascist Report from the UK, Vicky Osterweil on Election Cycle Amidst Ongoing Genocide

August 22, 2024

Welcome, to This Is America,
August 21st, 2024.

In today's episode, first we speak with the host of 12 Rules for What?, an antifascist podcast on the Channel Zero Network, about the wave of antifascist mobilizations against the far-right following a series of anti-immigrant riots in the so-called United Kingdom, after the spread of viral misinformation on social media.

We then present the audio version of a new text, The Election Cycle as Counter-Insurgency, and speak with Vicky, author of In Defense of Looting, about their thoughts on the recent election spectacle as the US continues to send billions in weapons and military aid to Israel.

All this and more, but first, let's get to the news!

Living and Fighting

Source: Triangle Mutual Aid

The Mutual Aid Disaster Relief network has been busy organizing in the face of flooding and wildfires across the US. Triangle Mutual Aid is also reporting live from South Carolina as the group is organizing on the ground with locals following massive flooding. From a recent update:

...[T]he network of people associated with Mutual Aid Disaster Relief (MADR) has been activated. The network of mutual aid groups has a Carolinas group chat populated with people from Raleigh, Durham, Chapel Hill, Carrboro, Asheville as well as a couple people in eastern NC closer to the impact zone, several supportive network members from Virginia and others from as far away as Florida. MADR people do an amazing job of coming together and coordinating activities in response to disasters. People collect supplies and organize transport to impacted areas. The national MADR organization has the ability to reimburse expenses and has teams of people knowledgeable in areas like radio communications, 3D printing medical supplies, solar power, and such. Supply drop-off locations have been identified in Greensboro and Raleigh and more are being worked on.

In the bay area, members of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW) held a picket at a bookstore where members of the union are fighting for a raise. In Lansing, several demonstrations were held outside of the homes of executives demanding that they cut ties with the Cop City project. Unicorn Riot also has a new report up about the recent Earth First! gathering in Pennsylvania which brought out around 400 people.

Targeted direct actions continue against the US supported war and genocide in Gaza. In the DC area, the office of AIPAC, one of the largest pro-Israel lobbies, was hit with extensive vandalism and graffiti. More actions took place in Los Angeles, CA, Romulus and Ann Arbor in Michigan and New York City.

Source: Never Sleep

According to a communique posted to Never Sleep:

More than 15 CitiBank locations were sabotaged...across so-called New York City. We jammed the locks and card access readers, sprayed the windows and buildings, and issued warnings in red paint underscoring the company's investments in genocide: "ABOLISH ISRAEL, FREE PALESTINE" and "THIS IS A WARNING: DEFUND NOW."

CitiBank facilitates billions in bonds sales for Raytheon and Lockheed Martin, which manufacture missiles and fighter jets used by the IOF to kill hundreds of thousands of Palestinians in Gaza. CitiBank is also the largest U.S. bank operating in the Zionist entity and heavily invests in the technology sector there, contributing to the "tech-washing" of apartheid, occupation, and ongoing genocide. From its shameful history in Haiti and apartheid South Africa to financing IOF arms and settlements, CitiBank has long profited from settler colonialism.

According to a report in Cambridge Day, pro-Palestine protests seem to have shut down an office of KMC Systems, "a subsidiary of [the] Israeli defense contractor Elbit Systems" which has been made "virtually empty... and there are other signs that the company is leaving the city. The building...that houses KMC has been targeted by pro-Palestinian demonstrations for months."

As this podcast was being finished, thousands mobilized to march on the DNC and call for a ceasefire and an arms embargo against Israel, as the city was flooded with thousands of riot police. On the first day of the DNC, protesters were able to push through one fence, but were quickly shut down by protest marshals and law enforcement, according to a report from Unicorn Riot. Demonstrators also attempted to set up an encampment at a local park, but were ultimately shut down by police. The next night, police clashed with demonstrators outside of the Israeli embassy, as journalists and protesters were arrested. For more coverage, check out It Could Happen Here and live coverage from Unicorn Riot.

Natasha Lennard at the Intercept noted that several "progressive" politicians such as AOC helped to white-wash the Biden administration's ongoing support for the continued genocide in Gaza, as the Democrats have pushed a platform which calls for greater police and border militarization and Harris has signaled that her administration will not deviate from supporting Israeli apartheid. The Intercept also reported that demonstrators arrested at the DNC "reported injuries from police violence that required hospitalization and a lack of access to attorneys or medication while in custody."

Help Launch subMedia's New Series: InterRebellion

Aug 20, 2024

Announcing a new media project, InterRebellion, from long-time anarchist film collective, subMedia. To support the project, go here.

InterRebellion is an upcoming documentary project from subMedia about the historic wave of protests and uprisings that broke out around the globe between late 2018 and mid 2020. It is planned as a limited ten-part series, featuring interviews with anarchists, anti-colonial militants, and other front-line revolutionaries from:

- Ecuador
- Chile
- Haiti
- France
- Hong Kong
- Lebanon
- Iraq
- Sudan
- Canada
- The United States

Motivated by the principle and spirit of revolutionary internationalism, we plan to collaborate on the production of each episode with local and diasporic anarchist and anti-colonial filmmakers, artists, and content producers. By doing so, we hope to amplify the voices of those most qualified to tell the stories of these uprisings, to increase the capacity and reach of anarchist media production from the global south, and to forge working relationships with new comrades and co-conspirators in order to pave the way for the further decentralization of the subMedia collective. We also plan to translate the series into multiple languages, to help build solidarity across state-imposed borders.

The title of the series comes from the Latin for 'between uprisings'. This speaks to what we see as the cyclical nature of revolt, and the critical need to prepare for the struggles ahead. To this end, we plan to use this series as a vehicle to summarize the hard-won tactical and strategic lessons from recent uprisings, and to explore the social, political and military limits that participants ultimately ran up against - so that future movements will be able to learn from, and ultimately surpass them.

As we set out to begin work on this series, we are putting out a two-part call:

1. For participants of the revolts listed above, who would like to share their stories, or who are otherwise interested in collaborating on this project. We are particularly excited to connect with filmmakers, audio/podcast/radio producers, movement journalists, or other anarchist media collectives from each country.
2. For supporters willing to donate to make this project financially viable. We would like to establish a modest budget of $1,000 - $2,000 per episode to cover potential travel costs, to pay local videographers and/or purchase gear for local anarchist media collectives - particularly those in the Global South without access to quality video equipment. Any additional funds raised beyond our initial goal will go towards improving the overall quality of the series' production value.

This is an ambitious project, and we are excited to start work on it. We hope that this excitement extends to our supporters and to future collaborators. Without you, it simply won't be possible.

Anarchists in the Labor Movement #3

Aug 20, 2024

Black Rose Anarchist Federation continues to speak with anarchists involved in the labor movement.

This is the third installment in our Anarchists in the Labor Movement series. Click through the links to read installment #1 with an education worker and #2 with healthcare workers.

In this interview we speak to Daniel Bovard-Katz, a metalworker in a midwestern U.S. state.

As the title suggests, this series engages with anarchists who are active in workplace organizing.

Some of those we speak to in this series are building a militant minority within the rank-and-file of their existing union, others are organizing the unorganized through new union campaigns, while others still are finding ways to build the capacity to win shop floor fights in contexts where union support is not available.

In part, our aim with these interviews is simply to shine a light on the presence of anarchist militants in the U.S. labor movement. More substantively, we ask participants to critically reflect on their experiences, including both successes and failures, to draw out generalizable lessons.

Some, but not all of those interviewed in this series are members of Black Rose / Rosa Negra.

Answers have been edited for clarity and length

Daniel Bovard-Katz - Metalworker

BRRN: How would you summarize your politics in one sentence?

Daniel: I believe in radical democracy, meaning all people having equal power to affect society.

BRRN: Can you share some background about the campaign you are working on?

Daniel: I have worked on a lot of campaigns, organizing in my own workplace and supporting others doing so. For my own workplace, I live in the Midwest and work in the metal and machinery industry, broadly defined. We're not pursuing NLRB¹ recognition, so there's no determined bargaining unit. I started organizing over frustration with working significant unpaid overtime several years ago, but stopped after basically winning on that issue for myself and one co-worker in a similar role as mine. A friend was hired into the company and recruited someone she worked closely with, which revitalized the effort recently.

BRRN: Are you working with an established union or going independent?

Daniel: We're part of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). I was recruited to the IWW because they seemed to be the only people interested in organizing all workers.

BRRN: How do you see your anarchist politics as relating to organizing for power with coworkers?

Daniel: There is an emphasis on democratic decision making throughout the union, including at the campaign level. Otherwise, politics don't come up much.

BRRN: Do you ever talk about your anarchist or anti-authoritarian politics with coworkers? Do you talk 'politics' (world events, local power structures) with your coworkers at all?

Daniel: Very rarely, and usually pretty surface level. I did have one conversation with a co-worker where we discussed issues at work and how to address them, but afterward he brought up Narendra Modi, who he was a big supporter of, and said that Indian Muslims were all supporters of terrorism. I tried to gently push back on this, talking about how people in the US also have blamed Muslims for terrorist attacks they had nothing to do with, but I don't think I was very successful. In retrospect, I think that I should have worked harder at this conversation and spent more time finding out why he said that, but I was a little out of my depth.

BRRN: Does your campaign include others who see themselves as 'political', but are part of a different political tradition or political organization?

Daniel: I'm not sure. I would guess everyone who has joined the union sees themselves as some sort of radical leftist, while some more conservative workers have agreed with the need for change and even collective action, but have not yet been asked about joining a union. We're in the beginning stages of organizing, so this may be a difficulty later on, but so far has not really been a problem.

BRRN: Does organizing in unions fit into your vision for transforming society or for revolution?

Daniel: Yes, as I said above, I think the core of my belief is democracy, in the sense of people having equal power, and unions are perhaps the only way to meaningfully shift power in the workplace, which is where most of the decisions in society are made. So my process would be something like (1) form unions in all workplaces, (2) build up those unions to the point of actually making decisions about what is produced democratically, (3) cut out the layer of management that no longer does anything, and (4) replace state control of society outside of workplaces with worker control by control of the industrial production that is needed for a complex society.

BRRN: What resources have helped you most as you've organized?

Daniel: The IWW Organizer Training program is very good.

BRRN: What advice can you share with anarchists looking to organize a union? What do you wish you had known when you started?

Daniel: You have to build a relationship with people based on caring about them. Talk to your coworkers and learn more about them, even before you start having organizing conversations. Be someone who people like (or at least don't hate) working with and talking to.

An Antifascist Analysis of Christian Dominionism

and the New Apostolic Reformation

August 16, 2024

A critical analysis of the New Apostolic Reformation (NAR) and Christian Dominionism from Philly Fash Watch.

The purpose of this text is to provide anti-fascists with the necessary background to understand the beliefs, organizing model and radiant influence of The New Apostolic Reformation \(NAR\), as well as the particular threat it poses as an emerging center of gravity for the developing American fascist movement.

There are many denominations and movements cultivating authoritarian political beliefs amongst Christian Americans, but the New Apostolic Reformation is unique in terms of its inherently authoritarian politics, theological flexibility, networked organizational structure and ability to influence Christians from different traditions.

Furthermore, the NAR was the first Christian group to promote Trump, and have taken on the role of his spiritual advisors and links to the Evangelical community. This was originally a controversial move, but was justified by comparing the obviously godless Trump to King Cyrus of Persia, the virtuous pagan who ended the Babylonian captivity and allowed the Jews to return to Palestine. This rather impressive theological bullshit has paid back in dividends as more and more Christians have accepted the idea that modern Prophets are guiding the Christians of America.

Christian Dominionism is defined as the belief that Christians should take control of the State. While the term has entered the mainstream of many parts of the American Left, many antifascists tend to see it as just another incarnation of evangelical politics, if a more totalitarian one, and not particularly worthy of much attention when compared to the deluge of white supremacist shooters and would be terrorists currently threatening our communities.

While neo-Nazis represent the most advanced terrorist threat within the far-Right, the New Apostolic Reformation is the most advanced social threat. By this we mean that they have an extraordinary power to shape the very experience of reality of massive communities of American Christians. Most neo-Nazis are skeptical of mass politics, due to the long history of federal infiltration of their movements. The New Apostolic Reformation is devoted to mass politics; their faith revolves around the concept of revival, or mass conversion to their cause.

Currently, the NAR is dedicated to winning power via the legitimization of the American political process. They have already had a good deal of success on this front. Representatives Lauren Bobert and Marjorie Taylor Green are deeply affiliated with the movement, as is the Speaker of the House, Mike Johnson. Pennsylvania State Senator Doug Mastriano and Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito are also connected, in addition to scores of state and local level office holders.

When Donald Trump, contrary to the prophecies of the movement, lost re-election, networks of "Prophets" and "Apostles" were some of the main forces in galvanizing the January 6th Capitol riot. This act demonstrated the movement's willingness to seize power by non-democratic means and should be understood as a sign of things to come. The New Apostolic Reformation is changing America, and if we want to prevent them from achieving the power they desire, we have to understand them on their own terms.

To call the NAR a denomination would be inaccurate, as it specifically emerged from the world of non-denominational charismatic Christianity. It would also ignore the vectors by which they are able to push their political theology into other Christian groups, Charismatic and otherwise.

Charismatic Christianity is an outgrowth of Evangelicism, particularly the Pentecostal Tradition, best known for its spectacular practices of snake handling and speaking in tongues. To be a Charismatic Christian is to seek a kind of constant mystical experience of reality, to be filled with the Holy Spirit and to see God's divine plan manifest in everyday life. It is a rather extraordinary tradition, because organized religion tends to put careful guardrails around mystic practices, and carefully guide mystics to incorporate their work into the pre-established orthodoxy of their religion. When this doesn't happen, mystics and their followers have a tendency of being destabilizing forces in society.

The roots of the NAR traces back to the work of a C Peter Wagner at Fuller seminary in southern California. Wagner was the student of John Wimber, of Grapevine ministries. Wimber brought the practices of independent non-denominational Charismatics to the more mainstream audience of Fuller, and Wagner was his student and successor. These were literal courses in miracles, and helped spread the Charismatic idea that belief Jesus and the presence of the holy spirit gave Christians supernatural powers.

Around the same time Wagner did graduate work in sociology studying Church growth. The Study of Church growth is a very involved discipline, and Wagner was focusing on Church Governance as a factor. In his later writings he proposed a new structure. He rejected denominational rules and bylaws, democratic structures and individual autocracy in favor of a networked ecosystem of Churches ruled by Charismatic leaders. Now many of these leaders who came into Wagner's emerging network had already begun to call themselves Apostles and Prophets.

These extraordinary titles are literal. These people genuinely believe they are receiving messages from the divine and being told to enact divine will. Their claims are justified using a concept called five-fold ministry which is extrapolated from Ephesians 4:11-13, "So Christ himself gave the apostles, the prophets, the evangelists, the pastors and teachers, to equip his people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ." While for the vast majority of more Orthodox Christians the Prophets are a thing of the past and the Apostles passed on their authority to the Church (or the Bible, if you are Protestant), Prophecy and Apostleship are alive and well for the Charismatics of the NAR.

This is the most extreme development away from Christian Orthodoxy since Martin Luther split from the Catholic Church, it is also the fastest growing form of Christianity in America as well as world wide. Furthermore, there is evidence that ideas from the NAR are finding influence in more traditional Churches. A (unreplicated, so inconclusive) study by Paul Djupe from Dennison University suggests that the core of NAR theology (belief in modern Apostles and Prophets) is extremely contagious, influencing the theology of much more mainline churches. In fact he suggests that as many as 25% of the American Christians he polled believe it.

While the NAR was a highly organized project, the nature of the networked structure and its spiritual oligarchy has tended towards a denial of its unified nature. The influence of a church growth scholar doesn't give the group legitimacy and the nature of Charismatic spirituality has a preference for the organic and spontaneous. Camouflaging themselves also allows for members of the NAR to recruit more traditional Christians slowly, rather than presenting their non-traditional nature for all to see. The American evangelical world is changing rapidly, and the NAR has set itself up to catch those who are looking for something new. This piece from writer Holly Pivec gives tips on how to find if churches are concealing their NAR affiliations.

Many progressives and leftists have told themselves that secularization is an inevitable process that will destroy the influence of the Christian-Right. The reality appears to be that as the number of Christians shrink, there is a growth in fanaticism and thirst for political dominance. The fact that the NAR puts so much stock in elections is due to their desire to be act in accordance with what they believe to be the divinely inspired principles of America. Their ultimate belief is that a precondition of the rapture is the triumph of the church over the earthly governments of the world. The failed insurrection at the capital demonstrated that if they cannot win at the ballot box, they will try by other means.

NAR leaders like Sean Fuecht (a harmless looking, guitar playing youth minister) have used Proud Boys as their personal security. They have deep connections to "Christian" and "patriotic" militias around the country. Furthermore, they urge their constituents to arm themselves and train for war against secular Americans who they believe are out to get them.

The most famous of these is probably Matt Shea, the former Washington State Representative for Spokane. Shea was removed from office for distributing a text he wrote called "The Biblical Basis for War," which contains the memorable line "Kill all males who do not submit." Shea maintains extensive networks at extremist churches across Idaho, eastern Washington and beyond. The most important thing to remember about these networks is that many participants in them have been preparing for an American civil war for nearly 50 years. These are people who read the Turner Diaries but are more concerned with oppressing people for not being Christian rather than not being white, though racism is often a hidden part of Christian supremacism.

As capitalist crisis and the general dysfunction of the American political system accelerates, new powers will emerge to fill in the cracks. The NAR will be amongst them, and the rest of us need a plan to counter them. They have been able to grow to the point of having

After nine months of genocidal violence in Gaza, Benjamin Netanyahu received a standing ovation from the United States congress as he described the slaughter of over 40,000 Palestinians as "a clash between barbarism and civilization" and promised US politicians that "our victory will be your victory."

Regardless of political affiliation, those who justify US support for the genocide in Gaza and identify with the militarized colonial project behind it are doing more to pave the way for fascism than Donald Trump or his supporters could ever do alone. By cheerleading these atrocities, they are normalizing the kind of bigotry and brutality that are essential to authoritarianism.

From the text about the collective defense against the J20 charges:

"Let us pause in awe at the stupefying hypocrisy of those who profess to believe in the 'rule of law.' How can it be that the prosecutor, the court bureaucracy, and two grand juries were permitted to terrorize two hundred defendants with multiple nonexistent felony charges for nearly a year? Surely, if anyone is still naïve enough to earnestly believe in the rule of law, they should consider those who are complicit in pressing nonexistent charges to be the number one threat to civil society. Prosecutors, police, and judges neither believe in nor uphold the rule of law any more than the most iconoclastic anarchist does. The difference is that anarchists are honest about this and propose an ethical alternative, whereas the professionals of the justice industry shamelessly pursue personal gain and little else."

Jennifer Kerkhoff, the prosecutor who attempted to put over two hundred people in prison for decades for the supposed crime of wearing black on the day that Donald Trump became president, is now facing charges for some of the false statements, misrepresentations, and omissions she committed in the course of prosecuting them.

No justice ever comes from the criminal justice system. But whenever lawyers and judges set out to intensify the ways that the system is used to target ordinary people, we should do our utmost to ensure that they fail.

Today, thousands of anti-fascists assembled around the UK to face down racist rallies. Most of the rallies never materialized.

Whenever fascists strike a blow, if we respond quickly and boldly, it offers an opportunity to draw more people into the struggle against capitalism, white supremacy, and the state. We must not let anyone imagine that the police will deal with fascists for us—on the contrary, they are a much greater threat to freedom than any group of ordinary racists.

The wave of racist attacks taking place around the UK is, in part, the consequence of right-wing billionaires acquiring control of social media. After Elon Musk bought Twitter, he reinstated the accounts of Tommy Robinson and many other fascists. One of Tommy Robinson's key henchmen posted the video that contributed to setting off this wave of attacks. Musk has continued to stoke the fires.

While liberals may respond by calling for more crackdowns on "extremism" on social media, such crackdowns would inevitably target the anti-fascists who represent the last line of defense against despotism. Instead, let's start by asking what billionaires like Elon Musk stand to gain from scapegoating immigrants and promoting civil war, then consider what it will take to stop them.

124 years ago today, Gaetano Bresci, an Italian anarchist who had already risked his life to save Errico Malatesta from an assassination attempt, sacrificed his life to impose consequences on the king of Italy for the deaths of hundreds of poor working people.

Under interrogation, he insisted that he acted alone, and said:

"I'm sure I was not wrong to do what I did. I do not even intend to appeal. I appeal only to the next proletarian revolution."

In his honor, we produced our first singing zine (sound on!). This particular zine performs "Alla stazion di monza," one of several traditional Italian songs about Bresci's courageous act of self-sacrifice.

A week and a half after we published this text, the Democrats finally compelled Joe Biden to withdraw from the 2024 presidential race. But our argument stands—not just because it took almost a month for Biden to withdraw, and not only because he simply passed the torch to Kamala Harris, who represents the same policies and the same ossified bureaucracy as Biden, but because all the problems we face remain as intractable as they were before he dropped out.

If democracy is so fragile that it could be abolished as the consequence of a single election, then it was already bankrupt—it was never a means by which to secure and defend the self-determination that everyone deserves. We need something more ambitious and resilient. We need a movement capable of facing down fascism as well as forcing out anyone else who tries to rule over us. We need a set of values, organizing principles, and strategies that can keep us oriented through the nightmare that is undoubtedly ahead.

A real solution would not change who the Democratic candidate for president is—it would render it irrelevant.

millions of members with powerful representation in government.

While effectively being a fascist organization, a church is not something that can be treated like a clique of boneheads. I would urge all antifascists to meet this threat with the utmost urgency and caution. No matter where you live in the US these people are making moves. The first course of action is to find out who locally is already mapping the Apostolic networks. This will likely mean working with liberals and even other Christians. We need these people as allies. There are theologians who's work consists of preventing churches from being taken over by NAR theology. The old slogan of the Anti-Racist Action (ARA) network was expose, oppose and confront. We need to expose Apostolic networks, their relationships with those in government and business, and the threat to our communities that they constitute. When they try to take over school boards, we need that to be publicized. When groups like Moms for Liberty pull their stunts, we need people to understand exactly what they are confronting.

We are well past the point that small group action can have an effect on a group of this scale. As this piece is being written it looks like the Trump campaign is sinking before our eyes. This could mean that the NAR will attempt another extra-legal attempt at seizing power like January 6th. Even if they accept defeat, they will not do so forever. They are building durable institutions to take power, and we need a long term plan to stop them.

Reportback on the Disruption of Fierté Montréal's Corporate Parade

August 15, 2024

Reportback from Faction Anti-Genocidaire et Solidaire on recent disruption of Pride in solidarity with Palestine.

On Sunday, the F.A.G.S. (Faction Anti-Genocidaire et Solidaire) and its queer and trans accomplices disrupted Fierté Montréal's corporate, Zionist, colonialist pride parade.

We gathered at 1pm in drag bloc outfits and makeup in the spectator zone at Place Ville Marie. Nearly a dozen cops with SIS armbands mobilized to surveil our gathering, as clearly a group of queers at pride protecting each other from COVID is cause for suspicion. At around 1:30pm, towards the beginning of the parade, we took to the street as Helem, Mubaadarat, and Independent Jewish Voices' Queer for Palestine float passed by. By marching behind their float as part of the parade for a short while, we managed to sooth the fears of the anxious piggies.

After briefly marching, we stood in place and deployed an extra-long banner to begin dispersing and disrupting the parade and deliver a speech on Fierté Montréal's corporate pinkwashing. After this, we communicated with the members of the AGIR float behind us, allowing them and several other community floats pass and continue parading, before blocking the Bubly sparkling water float.

We continued marching and zig-zagging backwards through the parade, largely evading police intervention and briefly blocking various floats tied to Zionist corporate interests. Floats and contingents in solidarity cheered us on and raised their fists as we passed. A small contingent carrying Zionist flags approached. We attempted to block them by rapidly deploying a second extra-long banner, but police brutally pushed us to the side of the road and stole our banner.

As cop presence began to escalate, we decided to switch directions and march back towards the front of the parade, following and protesting the Zionist contingent. After halting the parade several times on our way back towards the front, we stopped at Jeanne-Mance and René Levesque. Here, we blocked the entire back portion of the parade, where almost all complicit floats were located.

During this time, police, Zionists, private security and Fierté marshals attacked and insulted us while bystanders cheered us on and chanted with us. Autonomous members of the Helem, Mubaadarat, and IJV contingent came back to join us after their successful and poignant die-in disruption. Other members of the community responded to our public call for support. Our numbers were boosted to around 150 demonstrators.

As pigs multiplied and donned their riot gear, as prisoner transport vehicles arrived, as Fierté begged us to allow their corporate parade to continue, as Zionists threw projectiles at us, as the hot August sun beat down on us, we stood our ground.

As cops shoved us, pulled us, hit us with batons, tried to steal our materials, threatened us, and brutalized us in front of a crowd of our fellow queers, we remained steadfast and defiant.

We blocked the parade at Jeanne Mance for nearly an hour before police and class traitor Fierté marshals worked together to redirect the parade to the other side of the median.

After the parade went by on the other side of the road, we marched down René Levesque chanting slogans against pinkwashing and police. The vast majority of bystanders cheered us on, while certain bystanders shouted racist vitriol at us, showing their true colours as Zionist, capitalist, colonialist white cis men. We eventually dispersed into the Metro. No arrests were made.

Though we didn't manage to cancel the parade outright, we consider this action successful.

We blocked corporate floats long enough that many of their potential spectators further along the parade route left out of boredom. We showed queer bystanders and the media that police are not afraid to brutalize queers during a pride parade. We reminded the world that pride started as a riot against the police, not as a parade sponsored by corporate interests. We showed that as queers of conscience in Tio'tià:ke, like in Tkaronto, the Coast Salish territories colonially known as Vancouver, and elsewhere across Turtle Island and around the world, we will not accept a genocide in our names.

*Fuck pinkwashing
Fuck Fierté Montréal
Fuck the police
No justice
No peace*

Following Violent Attack by Proud Boys, Independent Journalist Alissa Azar Found Guilty on Charges of Riot, Disorderly Conduct

August 15, 2024

Report from the Civil Liberties Defense Center (CLDC) on the recent sentencing of independent journalist Alissa Azar.

Alissa Azar, prominent Syrian-American independent journalist in the Pacific Northwest, has been found guilty of riot, and disorderly conduct following her trial this week that resulted from her reporting at a Proud Boy recruitment show of force on June 18, 2021. This county, which shares a border with the City of Portland, Oregon, had been a flash point of far-right activity as less urban communities were tested for their tolerance of far right extremists such as the Proud Boys—who were central participants in the January 6, 2021 attacks on both the US and Oregon Capitols that day. On June 18th, five months after January 6th, [Proud Boy and...] the Vice Chair of the Clackamas Republican party, Daniel Tooze, who was present in the park that day, told park staff that he and the Proud Boys were going to attack any counter-protestors that showed up.

We are heartbroken report the untimely passing of Luciano Pitronello, known as Tortuga, an anarchist from the territory dominated by the Chilean state.

Here, you can read some of Tortuga's writing and some recollections of him:

<https://crimethinc.com/TortugaVive>

In 2011, at age twenty-two, Tortuga was severely injured during an attempt to carry out an attack on a Santander bank in Santiago. The explosion resulted in Tortuga losing one hand and suffering severe damage to his other hand as well as his eyes, skin, and lungs. At first, it was unclear to what extent he would recover.

Demonstrating admirable determination, he survived the ordeal and exceeded expectations in the extent of his recovery.

In 2012, Tortuga was acquitted of terrorism charges and released from prison. After his release, he helped to establish and maintain the self-managed social center and autonomous library Sante Geronimo Caserio.

Two days ago, while Tortuga was working in Santiago, he came into contact with electrical cables and was killed by an electrical shock. This tragedy illustrates that the most dangerous thing is not resistance—it is ordinary life at the mercy of capitalism. We honor all of the ways that Tortuga contributed to the struggle for a better world, not least the example that he set in confronting hardship.

Charlottesville Revisited—2017 to 2024

A review of the resistance to the "Unite the Right" rally, drawing on the recollections of some of those who were on the front lines.

<https://crimethinc.com/Charlottesvil>

Seven years ago, anti-fascists converged in Charlottesville, Virginia to oppose the "Unite the Right" rally, which brought together Klansmen, neo-Nazis, far-right militias, and fascists from the so-called "alt-right" aiming to build a unified white supremacist movement.

A few hundred brave people set out to stop them. The anti-fascists were outnumbered, underprepared, and terrified.

It's important to remember this today—first, because the Trump era still isn't over. As exhausting and demoralizing as it is, we still face the same threats and challenges we confronted seven years ago, and the outcome remains as uncertain today as it was then. Revisiting these events illuminates the stakes of the struggles before us now.

At the same time, the outcome of the events in Charlottesville shows how much a small number of courageous people can accomplish by putting their lives on the line when it counts, even when victory seems impossible.

Ten years ago today, a police officer in Ferguson, Missouri murdered an unarmed teenager named Michael Brown. In response, for a week and a half, an ungovernable revolt raged as angry residents and their supporters used a variety of tactics including arson, property destruction, looting, and gunfire to keep police at a distance and impose consequences for the murder.

Most people outside Black and brown communities had no idea how frequently police murder people in the United States until these events forced the topic into public discussion. Land Acknowledgement

The Democratic National Committee wishes to acknowledge that we gather together to state our values on lands that have been stewarded through many centuries by the ancestors and descendants of Tribal Nations who have been here since time immemorial. We honor the communities relative to this continent, and recognize that our country was built on Indigenous homelands. We say our respects to the millions of Indigenous people throughout history who have protected our lands, waters, and animals.

While we meet in Chicago, we also recognize and honor the traditional homelands of the Anishinaabe, also known as the Council of the Three Fires: the Ojibwe, Odawa, and Potawatomi Nations.

We acknowledge the many other tribes who consider this area their traditional homeland, including the Miami, Ho-Chunk, Menominee, Sac and Fox, Peoria, Kickapoo, Wia, Kickapoo, and Mascouten.

Democrats continue to support tribes as they advocate for the United States to uphold treaty and trust responsibilities. We applaud that in 2024, under the Biden-Harris Administration, the Prairie Band of Potawatomi Nation became the first federally recognized tribe to be recognized as a sovereign nation.

As demonstrators gather outside this week's Democratic National Convention in Chicago to protest the Democratic Party's continuing support of genocide in Gaza, it's a good time to revisit earlier anarchist mobilizations against the conventions.

In the years 2000, 2004, and 2008, anarchists converged on both the DNC and the RNC, asserting an anti-state political discourse and exerting pressure against the capitalist and militarist agenda that both parties share. These mobilizations helped establish countrywide networks and precedents. For example, the organizing against the Republican National Convention in St. Paul in 2008 produced the St. Paul Principles, a framework legitimizing a diversity of tactics, which helped resolve conflicts between pacifists and proponents of direct action.

There is a direct line of transmission from the convention protests to the uprising of 2020. A year of organizing for the 2008 mobilizations under the umbrella Unconventional Action produced chapters around the country. UA in the Bay kept organizing after 2008 and participated in the revolt when Oscar Grant was murdered, setting a precedent for the movement against police and white supremacy that burst into the public consciousness in 2014.

In their coverage of the Democratic National Convention, the New York Times reports that Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez said Kamala Harris represents the "working class." Actually, AOC said "middle class."

Let's unpack this little error.

When she entered Congress, AOC was a "democratic socialist." It only took a couple years for her to come around to using the same rhetoric as other politicians. This apparently took even the New York Times by surprise.

One of the chief forces protecting capitalism in the United States is that so many workers identify as middle class despite having no prospect of owning their own homes or retiring comfortably. There is a vast gulf in standard of living between a doctor and a barista.

Politicians and journalists do their best to obscure these differences. We're all supposed to think of ourselves as being somewhere in the middle. But if you consult the data, the majority of us are struggling while a small middle class and a very small ruling class make out at our expense.

As long as we put our faith in politicians, however "democratic" or "socialist" they claim to be, we will always end up being betrayed. We have to build powerful grassroots movements against capitalism itself — understanding ourselves as the protagonists, not politicians.

Queer Wanderings through the Other Germany and the Anti-Nazi Underworld

<https://crimethinc.com/QueerWanderings>

A thriving gay underground existed in Germany before the rise of the Third Reich. Some of the participants went on to carry out some of the fiercest resistance to the Nazis.

As fascism is on the rise today, we revisit this history, seeking tactics and inspiration for our own troubled times.

have targeted many other journalists who expose their bigoted violence. On June 18, Ms. Azar was threatened, menaced and physically assaulted by two large Proud Boys who were holding metal batons, sticks and bear mace. As a result of this chaotic and unusually violent Proud Boy attack, Ms. Azar was forced to use pepper spray in self-defense and in defense of her property that was being stolen and destroyed. She was then attacked from behind by one of the most notoriously violent Proud Boys, Gordon Cronk, Jr., who is currently facing numerous felony charges for other violent attacks on journalists and counter-protestors. Cronk, who wore full body armor, a helmet and gloves with metal plates in them, punched Ms. Azar in the head leaving her unconscious. Ms. Azar was simply wearing a tank top, pants, and her camera, and had no protective gear on that day. During Azar's trial, the state has attempted to paint her mere presence at this event — even though she was clearly a journalist — as "participating in the riot, and her personal political ideologies as an antifascist as evidence to justify the charges levied against her

The importance of free press to a democratic society has never been clearer as we witness the chilling effect on imposing criminal liability for journalists who risk their personal safety to cover highly controversial events. Expert witness Shane Burley explained that many journalists from larger outlets will only cover Proud Boy events while wearing war correspondent ballistic gear and accompanied by their own security. He testified that the main tenet of the Proud Boys is to engage in political violence. Mr. Burley also testified that the overwhelming majority of journalists and Americans consider themselves antifascists, particularly as opposed to identifying as a fascist or as part of a violent street gang like the Proud Boys.

In closing arguments, the state prosecutor, Joshua Cutino, indicated that the solution to the problem of large, armed and violent Proud Boy hate events in local communities is for everyone to "just drive by." Defense counsel responded by pointing out that in previous eras of fascist creep, such as those experienced in Nazi Germany, "driving by" fascist displays only emboldened what would become a genocide and a dark historic moment.

Despite the fact that arresting officers admitted on the stand that they arrived after widespread violence broke out and therefore did not witness the attack upon Ms. Azar, she was the only person with antifascist political beliefs to be charged (only 3 Proud Boys, including Cronk were also charged — Cronk and another man are still at large, wanted on warrants for their arrest). Alissa Azar is a known entity to not only the Proud Boys and extreme-right, but also to the local and regional police as well. Ms. Azar extensively covers activities of the extreme-right as well as abuse of power by law enforcement, which created questions of police bias and targeting, following her selective prosecution. As the defense argued in this case, Ms. Azar was not a leader or organizer of the June 18, 2021 event, nor is she a representative of "Antifa." If the state's reasoning for her arrest is simply that they needed to prosecute an antifascist 'so it would look fair,' and she was the easiest one to identify, that is an illegitimate basis to prosecute an individual.

Update from the Casey Support Committee

August 13, 2024

An update on political prisoner Casey Goonan. Originally posted by the Anarchist Black Cross Federation (ABC-F).

On July 23rd Casey was indicted by a federal grand jury on three charges all relating to the same incident. Two of the charges allege destruction of property by fire/explosives and carry a 5-20 year sentence each if convicted. The third charge alleges possession of an unregistered firearm and carries a maximum of 10 years (note: "firearm" here is referring to the alleged destructive device, not a gun). Casey's lawyers have officially agreed to represent them in federal court.

Casey is back in Santa Rita in federal custody and expects to remain where they are for the time being. All the transfers and changes in custody were jarring and Casey will hopefully be able to finally settle into a routine. Alongside their already rigorous usual studies they have been pursuing their own legal self-education in preparation for their ongoing case.

In observance of Black August, Casey will be participating in FLEA days along with one other person from their pod- 24 hour fasts in commemoration of New Afrikan revolutionaries on the days they were assassinated. People across the country have been putting out beautiful statements of support! These are so important as they demonstrate the incredible love people have for Casey for their years of commitment to community, solidarity, and mutual aid.

As a reminder:

- Do not discuss the case. Casey is still pre-trial and receiving mail concerning their case can seriously endanger them.

- Do not write anything you wouldn't want Fox News, a cop, or a judge to see. Assume that intelligence and law enforcement agencies are reading your letter.
- As you correspond with Casey, they may send requests aside from books or commissary. Please coordinate directly with Casey's Support Committee regarding additional asks.

If you wish to help keep money on Casey's books, there are several ways to do this:

- At the jail via the TouchPay kiosk in the lobby.
- Sending a money order in the mail. The money order must be made payable to "Casey Goonan #UMF227" and there must be no other material in the envelope. No cash or personal checks will be accepted.
- Online with a credit card via one of the vendor platforms run by GlobalTel such as accesscorrections.com or connectnetwork.com. You will have to create an account. If the platform offers different fund options, the fund you want to get Casey money for commissary is called the "Trust Fund".

"Should Anarchists Vote?" is the Wrong Question

August 13, 2024

A critical reflection from Wayne Price on the question of participating in elections. Originally posted to Anarkismo.

by Wayne Price

As I write this, we are moving ever closer to U.S. Election Day November 2024. (Although if this is read after that election, the issues discussed should still be relevant.) The small number of people who regard themselves as anarchists are discussing whether to vote. From Michael Bakunin and Peter Kropotkin in the late 19th century onward, revolutionary anarchists have rejected participation in elections.

In the words of Kropotkin, "The anarchists refuse to be a party to the present state organization and to support it by infusing fresh blood into it. They do not seek to constitute, and invite the workmen not to constitute, political parties in the parliaments.... They have endeavored to promote their ideas directly among the labor organizations and to induce those unions to a direct struggle against capital...." (2002; p. 287)

This is based on the central insight that the state is not neutral. By its nature, it serves the rich and powerful in their exploitation and oppression of the people. This state machinery cannot be used to peacefully and "democratically" create a free socialist democracy. Anarchists believe that capitalism and its state must be overturned, abolished, and replaced with cooperative, self-managed, alternate institutions. They should not be strengthened by joining in sham rituals of limited democracy.

Yet here we have a presidential election in which one candidate (the Republican Donald Trump) is arguably much more evil than the other (the Democrat Kamala Harris). Should anarchists vote for the lesser evil for once?

Many Marxists are also in a pickle. From Karl Marx on, their strategy has been to create a workers' party in opposition to all capitalist parties, from liberal to conservative. Many Marxists, at least those influenced by Trotskyism, have opposed ever voting for capitalist parties. Yet here they are facing two capitalist parties, one which is in the bourgeois center and the other is quasi-fascist. Should they vote for the moderate capitalist candidate? (Also, libertarian-autonomist Marxists generally reject voting and are in a similar bind as the anarchists.)

However, when discussing this (and previous) elections with friends, co-workers, and family, I do not try to persuade them not to vote for the lesser evil Democrats. I don't much care. One or a few individual votes does not make much difference. The votes of a small number of radicals do not have much of an impact. This is especially true for most U.S. citizens, due to the archaic and undemocratic Electoral College system. Only a minority live in the six or so "battleground states." For everyone else, their votes are irrelevant; the fix is in. (For example, I live in New York State, whose electoral college votes will certainly go to the Democrats.)

Instead, I try to get others to agree that the lesser evil is indeed evil. Since it is hard for people to admit to themselves that they are supporting an evil, there is a tendency for liberals, after a while, to persuade themselves that the lesser evil, while not perfect, is really pretty good.

Liberals claim that there are various positive programs for which the Biden-Harris administration can take credit. True or not, these must be put alongside the mass murder being carried out in Gaza by the Israeli government, paid for and armed by the U.S. state. Tens of thousands of Palestinians have been indiscriminately killed. This is only one activity of the enormous US military-industrial complex, endorsed by both parties, including hundreds of overseas military bases and enough nuclear bombs to exterminate humanity. Not to mention the immigration policies

"Ocasio-Cortez said, "Kamala is working tirelessly for a ceasefire" – to thunderous applause. It may or may not be true, but such an approach would stand in contrast to the Biden-Harris administration's record. Since Harris accepted the presidential nomination, the administration approved a $20 billion weapons sale to Israel, without any conditions. If this is "working tirelessly" for an end to the fighting, Harris is bad at her job."

From Biden's Crime Bill in 1994, to "Operation Gatekeeper" which helped militarize the US/Mexico border following the passing of NAFTA, the Democrats have been one of the main architects of mass incarceration and police militarization.

Their recent support for the creation of "Cop Cities" in the wake of the George Floyd uprising and systematic attacking of social movements from Occupy, to Standing Rock, and the current campus occupations in solidarity with #Palestine only further illustrate this reality.

"Released August 18, the 2024 platform evinces a disturbing rightward lurch for the Democrats on immigration and policing. In a stark tonal shift from its 2020 agenda, the Democratic Party has quietly caved in to right-wing fearmongering about crime and public safety."

The message here is that the State and its police aren't here to protect students from actual violent threats - in fact the most violent threat to students beyond the far-Right and violent supporters of Israel, is the police themselves.

For years the UC system used the full force of the police to attack antifascists protesting white supremacists and anti-Semites. Now, they want to mobilize their forces against those protesting in support of Palestine.

time I did while they supported and wanted to help but they were leaving. A lot of this delaying ended up being due to concerns for security, and while it's definitely important, we shouldn't let it slow us down. I'd also say reach out to political people of course, but don't count on them. I think it's important to just engage in a spirit of solidarity with your coworkers: you're all in it together, and you want to be reaching out to all of them.

I'd also say this probably applies to any union, but when working with NNU, try to maintain your own contact networks. The organizers try to route a lot of the connections through themselves, but can be kind of hit or miss on how good they are at following up. Further, it seems that once the union is formed, NNU doesn't provide a lot of structure. It seems to me that for power to remain with the rank and file and not just default to national leadership in the absence of a governing structure, we'd need to maintain our own networks that we can use to fill that void. Don't surrender the organizing to the organizers, we need to remain actively engaged to win and hold worker power.

This is America #199: Antifascist Report from the UK, Vicky Osterweil on Election Cycle Amidst Ongoing Genocide

Welcome, to This Is America, August 21st, 2024. In today's episode, first we speak with the host of 12 Rules for What?, an antifascist ...

The crackdown on pro-Palestinian protests and press covering the demonstrations in the streets of #Chicago during the #DNC should be seen not as a surprise, but part of a strategy of counter-insurgency.

This is coupled with an attempt by the party to incorporate a "progressive" veneer - made possible by politicians like #AOC and others - which seeks to crack these movements and defang them.

To move people off the streets and herd them back into the terrain of representative politics. To expand the divide between "peaceful protesters" and "outside agitators" to its logical conclusion: the nullification of class struggle and anti-colonial conflict.

The Democrats want to throw a wet blanket on protest movements and social struggle, and instead make them part of a broader coalition that takes orders from the party apparatus that is managed by those loyal to the Pentagon, Wall Street, and ruling class interests.

<https://itsgoingdown.org/problem-peaceful-protesters/>

of the Democratic administration. It worked out a "bipartisan" immigration bill which accepted the most repressive aspects of the Republican program. The bill only failed when Trump denounced it, being unwilling to let the Democrats get credit. The extent of economic inequality and regional stagnation has increased—major factors in pushing white workers toward Trumpism. And the Biden-Harris government has presided over a vast expansion of US gas and oil production, further attacking the biosphere. The Democrats talk a good game about ending global warming, but their policies are inadequate and will eventually lead to the destruction of industrial civilization. The lesser evil is still plenty evil.

The Real Question is Mass Strategy

The important question is not what a small number of isolated radicals should do on election day. It is what revolutionary anarchists should advocate for the large organizations, communities, and movements: the unions, the African-American community, Latinx people, immigrants, Arab-Americans, organized women, LGBTQ people, environmentalists, anti-war activists, etc., etc. Overwhelmingly such forces follow a strategy of organizing for the Democratic Party, providing it with money and personnel. They are the "base" of the Democrats, without whom the party would collapse. (In the U.S. system, neither party has an actual membership.)

What anarchists and other radicals should advocate is that these groupings cease spending money and people on the Democrats and adopt an alternate, non-electoral, strategy of direct action.

Overall the liberal strategy (also carried out by democratic socialists and Communists) has not worked out very well. Since the end of World War II, conservative presidents and Congresses have been followed by more-or-less liberal/moderate presidents, to great rejoicing by progressives and reformists. But these have never resulted in stable progressive change. Time after time, these liberal/moderate administrations have been followed by ever-more reactionary governments.

Kennedy-Johnson was followed by Nixon. Carter was followed by Reagan and then the first Bush. Clinton was followed by the second Bush. Obama was followed by Trump, so far the worst of all. The election of Biden did not stop the growth of Trumpism and its complete takeover of the Republican Party. Even if Trump is defeated in November 2024, the far-right semi-fascist movement will continue to grow. It will threaten to come to power in the not-so-distant future. Over time, the greater evil cannot be defeated by a lesser evil. Only a radical alternative can do that.

The main policy of the "democratic socialists" (social democrats, reformist state socialists) has been to work in the Democratic Party. They hope to take it over, or at least to take over a section. This is the program of Bernie Sanders or Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez and most of the Democratic Socialists of America. Instead, it is they who have been taken over, grumbling about the Biden-Harris genocide in Gaza but powerless to make real change in the government. They are stuck supporting a government of mass murder—as the lesser evil.

Some radicals criticize the Democratic Party, for good reasons. They wish to replace this party of capitalism, imperialism, racism, and ecological catastrophe with a new party. This might be called a labor party, or a progressive party, or a Green Party, or a people's party. It might start from scratch or be broken off from the Democrats.

The implication is that the problem is the Democratic Party in itself, rather than the electoral system of the capitalist state. But building a new party in the U.S. would be extremely difficult—by no accident. The vast amount of money needed, the Electoral College, the gerrymandering of districts, the number of signatures to get on the ballot, the dirty tricks of the two established parties, the differing election cycles for different positions—all these and more make a successful new party virtually impossible. The last time it happened was the creation of the Republican Party over the slavery issue, as the country was on the verge of a civil war.

In any case, the various advocates of some kind of new party have rarely examined the history of socialist electoralism. There is a long history of independent socialist parties running in elections in Europe and elsewhere. As anarchists predicted, the elected socialist representatives invariably adapted to the political milieu of the government. They made deals and became chummy with their bourgeois counterparts, becoming bourgeois politicians themselves.

Whenever these parties came close to real power, the capitalists have squelched them. Businesses have gone on "capital strikes," refusing to invest in the country and shutting down industry. They have spent large sums on conservative parties. They have subsidized fascist gangs. They have promoted military coups. Social democrats have been forced to capitulate or be overthrown. From the early social democrats to the rise of European fascism to the history of socialists in France, Chile, Greece (Syriza), Venezuela, and so on, electoral strategies have never worked to move toward a new society. Yet each time there is an upswing of the left, reformist socialists treat an electoral approach as a brand-new brilliant idea.

If Not Elections, Then What?

The liberals and democratic socialists asked: If not elections, then what? How will the people assert power against the ruling elites? Or are you waiting for the Great Day, the Final Revolution, which will solve all our problems? What do we do in the meantime?

Anarchists too are for improvements in the lives of ordinary people. Anarchists are not for waiting for the revolution, which is not around the corner. The fight for reforms may cause people to have better lives in the here and now. Even if such fights were to fail, at times, working people may learn lessons about who their real enemies are and how to fight them. But revolutionary anarchists do not advocate attempts to use elections and party politics to gain improvements. What then?

Errico Malatesta argued that “what little good...is done by elected bodies...is really the effect of popular pressure, to which the rulers concede what little they think is necessary to calm the people.... [Electionists] compare what is done in the electoral struggle with what would happen if nothing were done; while instead they should compare the results obtained from...the ballot box with those obtained when other methods are followed, and with what might be achieved if all effort used to send representatives to power...were [instead] employed in the fight to directly achieve what is desired.” (Malatesta 2019; p. 179)

To repeat the previous quotation from Kropotkin, anarchists “have endeavored to promote their ideas directly among the labor organizations and to induce those unions to a direct struggle against capital.”

Consider major movements in U.S. history: In the thirties and afterward, workers won union recognition in major industries. They did this through huge strikes, occupations of factories, and fighting with scabs, vigilantes, police, and the national guard. The New Deal instituted social security and other welfare benefits due to this mass pressure from below.

In the fifties and sixties, African-Americans won the end of legal Jim Crow and racist terror. They engaged in boycotts, mass “civil disobedience” (law breaking), demonstrations, and urban rebellions (“riots”). The right to vote, desegregation, anti-discrimination laws, and anti-poverty programs were achieved through these struggles from below.

The movement against the U.S. war in Vietnam included huge demonstrations, draft resistance, civil disobedience, university occupations and strikes, and a virtual mutiny in the military. (And, of course, the military fight of the Vietnamese people.)

In this period, there was an upsurge in labor, including organizing unions and strikes in health care and for public employees, as well as wildcat strikes in key industries (such as the post office).

The LGBTQ movement exploded with the Christopher Street rebellion. It included the later ACT-UP civil disobedience to fight against public inaction on AIDS. The women’s liberation movement developed in the context of these popular struggles and radicalization.

Periods of radicalization have died down. The unions became integrated into the system, heavily reliant on the Democratic Party. Legal segregation was ended—although African-Americans were still on the bottom of U.S. society. The U.S. state withdrew from Vietnam—although imperialism and war continue. The Black movement became co-opted by the Democrats and so were the remnants of the anti-war movement. The Democratic party served as the “graveyard of movements.”

However, the lessons remain, that real victories can be won through popular mass movements and direct action, outside of the electoral trap. The growth of union militancy in recent years and the pro-Palestinian movement on and off university campuses, give hope for the future. One general strike in a big city could change national politics. There is no road to anti-state socialism except through the mass action of the people.

Is It Fascism Yet?

Every election cycle, liberals are prone to shout that “fascism is coming!” unless the Republicans are defeated. Are they right this time? There is widespread fear, spread by liberals, and even not-so-liberal Democrats, that the election of Trump would be the replacement of U.S. democracy by a fascist-like dictatorship. On the other hand, among the far-left, there are those who argue that there really is no significant difference between the two capitalist parties. However there are other alternatives between overt fascism and there being no important differences.

In my opinion, there is little likelihood that a Trump victory would quickly install a regime on the model of classical European fascism. That would require declaring Trump president-for-life, cancelling all further elections, outlawing all other parties including the Democrats, suspending the Constitution, and arming a uniformed vigilante movement similar to Hitler’s Storm Troopers or Mussolini’s Black Shirts.

Business people do not want this; after all they are making a lot of money under the current arrangement. (Most of business—now called “the donor class”—backs the Democrats in recent elections.) There is widespread unrest but not enough to make the bosses feel threatened in their wealth. The rest of the establishment, in and out of government, does not want overt fascism—including the “intelligence community” (national police forces) and the top military brass. It is impossible to make a successful coup without the support of the people with money and the people with guns. And at least half of the population does not want this.

More likely is a creeping authoritarianism, keeping the forms of political democracy while emptying them of content. It will tend toward Victor Orban’s Hungary rather than Hitler’s Third Reich.

“What we are likely to see is a lingering fascism of less murderous intensity, which, when in power, does not necessarily do away with all the forms of bourgeois democracy, does not necessarily physically annihilate the opposition, and may even allow itself to get voted out of power occasionally. [As recently happened in Poland—WP] But since its non-nurse union just wouldn’t have gotten the traction to get us even where we got. That said, NNU was not perfect. I generally perceived a reluctance from their leadership to invest resources in our effort because of the size of our institution. It seems that after their loss at Hopkins, they’re pretty gunshy about large hospital systems and are focusing more on smaller institutions they think they can win more easily and with less perceived risk. I also think we would have benefitted from more organizers from NNU and more experienced organizers. They had a tendency to assign us organizers and then reallocate them frequently; hand-off was often not great and contacts were lost in the process. It created an air of noncommitment from NNU and unseriousness that definitely frustrated our nurses.

I wouldn’t say these issues defeated our campaign though. Ultimately, the major issue we ran into was just the level of turnover our hospital experiences — but the lack of experienced organizers and the frequent trading out of organizers didn’t help. Still though, I think NNU was probably the better choice for us because it opened door with nurses to have faith in the effort.

BRRN: How do you see your anarchist politics as relating to organizing for power with coworkers?

David: To me, workplace organizing is the ultimate expression of anarchist politics. I affiliate with anarchism mostly because I believe in the democratic organization of our society and economy. I believe in building democratically organized popular power at our jobs. It’s where we enlist ourselves into the application and production of power. So gaining power in our workplaces is one of the most direct ways for us to build popular power and change the conditions of our lives, and that’s what I’m seeking.

BRRN: Do you ever talk about your anarchist politics with coworkers? Do you talk ‘politics’ (world events, local power structures) with your coworkers at all?

David: We talk about politics at work frequently. My coworkers are generally either apolitical or progressive/liberal. I often engage in these discussions; I enjoy talking and debating this stuff with them. I think they know I’m pretty far to the left, and I generally share with those I’m close with that I’m an anarchist. I try not to get into too much leftist rhetoric with my coworkers: I don’t think they’re very familiar with it so it doesn’t connect with them. People are always willing to talk shit about our bosses and administration though. Folks are really animated by talk about controlling our own work, having power in our workplace, and what we’re owed for the work we do. I also have found that talk about workplace democracy is an idea that can connect with people. Apolitical people already have an understanding of democracy, so it’s not a big leap to be like, “Hey, why doesn’t our workplace work like that? Why do we supposedly have a say in our government but not when we’re at work?” People seem to get that.

BRRN: Did your campaign include others who see themselves as ‘political’, but are part of a different political tradition or political organization?

David: I reached out to some left organizations around our city to see if they could help me with connecting to other nurses, but sadly they weren’t much help. There were other political anarchist-aligned folks who were involved, some really actively and consistently and others not. I was honestly a bit disappointed at how some folks who seemed to profess our ideology didn’t show up. I also have been kind of bummed to see how many anarchists just uncritically went into travel nursing. Travel nursing has acted as a release valve for our institutions, allowing them to shuffle nurses around without having to fire anyone. Staff leaving was what ultimately undid our campaign.

We ended up at a place where many of the units had been cored out staff-wide, consisting only of very senior nurses just trying to get to retirement without issue and new grad nurses who didn’t plan to stay, neither were willing to take on the leadership in their units to make the union happen. The people who could lead in these units, middle-experience nurses with years of work left and who know their coworkers, all left for travel positions, especially the political ones and those who were agitated about our working conditions. This may have given them a better paid deal for a while, but in the end it’s leaving us all with a rawer one. I think all of us who align with anarchism need to consider what use having a political identity is if we are not willing to act on it.

BRRN: Does organizing in unions fit into your vision for transforming society or for revolution?

David: So I’ve lost a bit of faith in the idea of “the revolution.” I’m not sure it’s coming. I think we need to be honest with ourselves that our movement is relatively marginal at this point, we have limited reach and even more limited power, and I mean that for the entire left. So I think we need to be looking for niches where we can build power and expand from, so that when crises occur we can leverage our positions for greater popular power. I think nurse unions are a great avenue for that, so say the next time a crisis like COVID occurs, maybe we take over the hospitals, and who knows from there.

BRRN: What resources have helped you most as you’ve organized?

David: Honestly I’m not a big theory reader. I’ve been involved in radical organizing for a bunch of years now and I’ve learned a lot from my compatriots.

BRRN: What advice can you share with anarchists looking to organize a union? What do you wish you had known when you started?

David: Oh, I wish I did so much differently. First, I’d say we were too cautious to start. We should have started much earlier, even a few months earlier may have made a big difference. Talk to folks right away. There were a bunch of people that I held off talking to and by the

Xaquiri - Nurse

BRRN: How would you summarize your politics in one sentence?

Xaquiri: Anarchist-communist: a communist analysis of political economy with an anti-authoritarian praxis regarding power relations and the state.

BRRN: Please share some background on the campaign you are working on Xaquiri: We are a group of 800 Registered Nurses at a level one trauma center in Louisiana that is the non-profit descendant of a large public hospital that was closed after Hurricane Katrina. I had dreams of unionizing since I started working there five years ago, but that accelerated after the obvious dire necessity of COVID. We have had several failed starts in organizing since then, but the most recent campaign really took off this past spring, after another group of nurses at a neighboring hospital were on the verge of filing for election right before their hospital was sold to the parent company of my facility, so a lot of the energy from that organizing was spread to us.

BRRN: Are you working with an established union or going independent?

Xaquiri: We are working with an established union National Nurses United (NNU) because they were already on the ground working nurses at the other hospital that got sold. I also chose to engage with them because they have a lot of resources to invest in supporting our effort, which is unusual for an established union to put resources in organizing new facilities in the South. I also found them to take a more militant approach to organizing than many unions — greater willingness to strike, aversion to worker-management partnerships, and engagement with intersecting justice issues instead of a narrow focus on building membership.

BRRN: How do you see your anarchist politics as relating to organizing for power with coworkers?

Xaquiri: A big part of my politics is the belief in ordinary people to get radicalized and shift power relations away from capital right where they are. I'm excited to see people who have never considered themselves political before now becoming engaged with all sorts of struggles, and that is all based on recognizing their collective power and where they are positioned in relation to the ruling class.

BRRN: Do you ever talk about your anarchist politics with coworkers? Do you talk "politics" (world events, local power structures) with your coworkers at all?

Xaquiri: At this stage I generally try to avoid it because so many people are so new to this way of thinking.

BRRN: Does organizing in unions fit into your vision for transforming society or for revolution?

Xaquiri: I guess you can say I have an anarcho-syndicalist theory of change and popular power. Unions are the closest thing to a radically democratic organization with control over resources in our society. Showing people that it is possible to take power on a local level with broader implications over the whole society is one of the most important parts of building unions for me.

David - Nurse

BRRN: How would you summarize your politics in one sentence?

David: I'd say nowadays the ideology most animating to me is syndicalism.

BRRN: Share background about the campaign you worked on.

David: I'm a nurse at a large university hospital in the Southeast. During the height of COVID, people in my unit were pretty pissed off and I started to hear that folks were feeling similar elsewhere in the hospital too. I heard from a friend in management that the hospital thought there was a union push happening, so I thought that if there was, I wanted to be part of it. NNU had recently won an election at a hospital in our state, so I figured that if folks were organizing at our hospital it was probably them. I got in touch with NNU and asked if they were organizing at my hospital. They said no, but if I wanted to initiate something, they would be willing to help. I asked some of my coworkers what they thought, and they were all pretty on board, so we started.

Now sadly, our effort was not successful. After more than two years of organizing, engagement dropped to nil and NNU pulled out, I think rightfully. That said, the effort was not a total bust. My unit, which was probably the most fully organized, got new equipment we had been asking for years, our awful nurse manager got removed and replaced with our great clinical team lead, and faced with the prospect of a union, the hospital gave us the biggest raises since I've worked there, removed some of the hurdles placed on clinical ladder advancement, and gave us a parking stipend. Without a doubt the effort to unionize, even while unsuccessful, yielded improvements for nurses at our hospital.

BRRN: How did you decide between organizing with an established union and going independent?

David: We organized with NNU. What I found was that at our institution, in the South, there was a lot of fear around unionizing. People really had an impression that our institution was all powerful and could just crush anyone they wanted. Because of that, other nurses seemed to really want to be involved with a union that they felt was established enough to stand up to our institution. Organizing with NNU gave the nurses at my hospital faith that this was a serious effort that could actually make headway.

Sadly, I think organizing independently or with a smaller successor government...will also be incapable of alleviating the crisis, the fascist elements are likely to return to power as well." (Patnaik & Patnaik 2019; p. 29)

Some say that there is no cause for worry, since the U.S. has gone through periods of right-wing repression and came out okay. For example, in the 'fifties, after World War II, the U.S. was swept by anti-communist hysteria. This was led by Joe McCarthy, J. Edgar Hoover, the House Un-American Committee, and many more. The Democrats, from President Truman to the liberals, participated in it, instituting loyalty programs and political purges of government employees (including J. Robert Oppenheimer). People lost jobs in the civil service, schools, universities, unions, the entertainment industry, and elsewhere. Meanwhile the Southern states had legal racial segregation, violently enforced by the police and by the Ku Klux Klan. But eventually this repressive politics was cracked by the Civil Rights Movement and the anti-Vietnam War movement.

However, the fifties and sixties were the period of the "post-war boom," a big upswing of prosperity, at least for many white people in the U.S. The improvement in living standards made it unnecessary for the rulers to give up the advantages of political democracy (advantages for them), despite the upheavals of "the sixties."

Today the system confronts deeper crises. On a world scale capitalism is brittle and conflicted. There are wars raging in various places. The U.S. economy, while relatively stronger than the rest of the world for the moment, is in decline. Inequality is worse than ever, there is stagnation in large parts of the system, and it maintains profits by pumping out vast amounts of oil and gas—thus dooming industrial society. The unhappiness and discontent of large sections of the lower middle class and white working class has reached dangerous proportions. People are looking for solutions. Without a significant radical movement, these layers of the population look to the far-right. They are open to blaming Latino and Muslim immigrants for their problems. They become willing to listen to demagogues such as Trump, who promise to lead them to a mythical land of white supremacy, Christian dominance, and patriotic greatness.

How a few radicals, of various persuasions, vote or do not vote in November is not the important issue. The question is whether it is possible to develop an independent movement of movements, of the working class and all those oppressed and threatened by this disastrous system, to oppose the capitalists, their establishment, their state, and all their systems of oppression. It is whether a revolutionary anti-authoritarian wing of these movements can be organized to fight for a free society.

From Embers: Five Years After The Brawl At Hamilton Pride

August 13, 2024

Anarchist radio show and podcast From Embers speaks with former political prisoner Cedar on the five year anniversary of the confrontation between far-Right anti-LGBTQ+ bigots and attendees at Pride in Hamilton, ON.

Five summers ago on June 15th 2019, a group of homophobic "street preachers" and their white nationalist allies attempted to enter and disrupt the annual Hamilton Pride celebrations at Gage Park.

Based on experience the previous year at Hamilton Pride and elsewhere in southern Ontario, anarchists and radical queers were expecting this and had organized to counter them. Wearing pink t-shirts over their faces and carrying a 30' wide 9' tall black banner nicknamed the Black Hole, the Pride Defenders confronted the bigots and formed a wall between them and the Pride festival.

The situation in the park quickly escalated into an all-out brawl, with several Pride Defenders sustaining serious injuries. Despite the chaotic scene, the banner held and the haters accepted a police escort out of the park.

Much of the fight was captured on right-wing livestreams and it created an immediate political scandal. The Pride Committee blamed the police for failing to intervene and the Police Board announced an independent investigation. For their part, the Hamilton Police attempted to frame the anarchists as outside agitators, attempting to link the (relatively popular) Pride Defence to the (very publicly unpopular) Locke Street affair from the previous year, where anarchists had smashed windows of gentrifying businesses along Locke Street.

Anarchists who were still on conditions related to that earlier demonstration were targeted and arrested in the days following. Our guest today, Cedar, had her parole pulled ostensibly for participating in the fight - when it became clear that she wasn't even at Gage Park that day, the narrative changed to one of "incitement."

The police strategy to regain control backfired and the repression kicked off a month-long campaign to #FreeCedar and drop the charges against all Pride Defenders. The city was covered in graffiti and posters and there were several rowdy anti-police demonstrations, along with solidarity actions around the world. For in-depth analysis and coverage during this time, see our show notes for links to various statements and reports on North Shore as well as our two previous episodes on the topic.

Today we're sharing an interview with Cedar for the five year anniversary of the brawl and its aftermath. We discuss some of the ways anarchists in Hamilton have tried intervening in Pride over the years, the independent report and police recuperation, the problem with hate crime legislation, the worrying increase in anti-queer and anti-trans attacks from the post-Convoy far right in Canada, a predicted wave of reaction following the next federal election, and what we can do now to start preparing and practicing community defence.

Report on Black Rose Anarchist Federation 10th Anniversary Party

August 13, 2024

Report from 10th anniversary celebration for the Black Rose Anarchist Federation. Originally posted to Indybay.

by Hank Pellissier

Black Rose / Rosa Negro (BRN) Anarchist Federation celebrated their 10-year anniversary in an old fire station in downtown Oakland on Saturday, August 10. The event, attended by 80-100 people, opened with explanatory presentations by four comrades, and concluded with a DJ Dance Party. BRN's goal was recruitment of new members, an intention surely realized by the enthusiastic sign-up of dozens of attendees.

Revolutionary struggle requires "long and patient work" emphasized the speakers. "This is a marathon not a sprint." Defining their goal as attainment of "a world free of domination" the quartet clarified the difference between direct action ("reacting quickly with moral outrage") and organizing ("sinking roots into longterm relationships") and emphasized "the need to do more organizing than activism" to avoid "running from one crisis to another." Similarly, BRN's speakers talked about moving away from actions that only served a "symbolic" purpose; opting instead for militant strategies like withholding labor and refusing to pay rent.

Recent successes and failures - at a North Carolina high school and the Stanford encampment for Israel divestment - were relayed, with the positive message that every effort is useful because they always "build skills" in the participants.

Organizing unions non-ideologically around shared interests were explained as essential for success. "We even work with Democrats," joked one speaker, who later admitted that allying with genocidal Zionists was beyond challenging. Forming solidarity between blue collar and white collar workers, and sharing power, were also defined as top priorities. These ideals were expressed in BRN's goal to democratize a union, putting power back in the hands of the rank and file so they wouldn't get sold out by administrators.

Numerous pamphlets were distributed free to attendees, explaining the group's strategy and tactics. Anyone interested in joining was encouraged to examine information on their website <https://blackrosefed.org/>

The Election Cycle as Counter-Insurgency

August 12, 2024

It has been four years since a deadly pandemic ripped through the social terrain and the George Floyd uprising brought millions out into the streets, as those in power responded by telling us all to go back to work and sending in the National Guard. Months later, tens of thousands of Trump supporters, Proud Boys, and militia members attempted to install an internet troll as emperor.

Since then, the government has rolled back safety nets put in place during the pandemic, attempted to forestall an economic crisis while another tech bubble seems poised to burst, and rising inflation and price gouging has led to record corporate profits and increased anger and anxiety. In short, there should be no wonder why a deep pessimism has permeated in the face of what the two ruling parties have offered up this election cycle.

But while history will remember this year as a time when much of the country simply shrugged when a former president was shot by a member of his own party and a deeply unpopular incumbent was pushed out in the face of mass dissatisfaction, hidden from the headlines and the toxicity of the pundit class is both the worsening conditions of our lives and the attempt by the capitalist State to manufacture a narrative that not only distracts from the deepening crisis, but attempts to proclaim that the very system which accelerates it has a future.

Trump proclaims, again, that if he wins we'll all be rich. The Democrats tell us we already are.

Running From Policy

We're told so often that "we live in a democracy," some of us forget that we actually don't. What is up for offer from the ruling parties is not an organic expression of the will of the people, but instead an attempt at popularizing an operating system for a social order that is in deep crisis. Those that seek to rule us have no desire to even address, let alone fix, the material structural problems which permeate our lives. "Vibes" aside, the nausea produced by the current race has led to a deafening roar of mass nihilism, as we all doom scroll through the slow collapse of this civilization.

The scenes are different, but all speak to a drastic reactionary lurch happening within the ruling institutions of this society. The leader of the Teamsters union speaks at the RNC amid calls for the military to carry out mass deportations and with a straight face heralds the party as a friend to workers. White boomers hold up signs reading, "Mass Deportations Now!," and the Democrats respond by openly declaring that they will in fact be even more draconian at the border than Trump. Meanwhile millions of so-called "progressives" organize to "do the work" over Zoom calls, as families in Gaza watch as their children explode in Israeli airstrikes and the Democratic governor of California helps police evict a homeless encampment.

And here in lies the greatest irony of all: while both parties say they are "running on policy," by and large, their actual positions are not that completely unrelated to everything else that had happened earlier in the day. Not bad for a summer afternoon in these meteorologically and politically uncertain times ☺

August 5th

Sheffield Antifascist Network report from August 5th:

A statement can't do justice to the horrific scenes in South Yorkshire yesterday.

We want to thank everyone who turned up in Sheffield and saw off the fascists. But now isn't a time for celebration. What we saw yesterday and the reports from comrades on the ground in Rotherham comes nothing short of attempted murder.

And now we are seeing new threats and calls to action from the far-Right to target those that support asylum seekers. We cannot let this stand unopposed. To our comrades; stay safe. And to those who threaten our communities; let it be known ¡No pasarán!

Report from the Anarchist Communist Group \(ACG\) on Plymouth, Devon on August 5th:

At least two hundred fascists faced us tonight, and I would estimate three hundred antifascists were present.

The Stand Up Against Racism counter-demo began at 6pm, and there was already a notable fash presence, despite their own demo (riot) not being due to start until 7pm. The police presence was light, and a group of 30 or so anarchists patrolled the outskirts of the counter-demo, and were needed to forcibly remove a number of fash that attempted to infiltrate the counter demo to attack/heckle speakers.

As the clock ticked towards 7, more and more police vehicles began to surround us, but worryingly, we seemed to have small groups of fash on all sides of us, just standing around, seemingly unnoticed by the police. Just before 7, it became apparent there was a very large fascist presence moving south towards us on Armada way. They were stopped by a line of police, and chanting began from both sides. As far as I could tell, they were completely drowned out by our side.

Towards 8pm, the lead fash elements began to try and break clear of the police, making their way along Royal Parade, the small black bloc group followed them - and found ourselves directly face to face with punches being thrown for a few moments, until the police managed to get back in between us again. A stand off then ensued on the corner of Whimble Street, and before long we found ourselves under a barrage of beer cans, bottles, and rocks the size of my hand.

Some time later, the fash moved to the opposite end of Armada Way, towards the Theatre Royal, attempting to get around the police to get at us again. We continued to shadow them, and again had to meet them head on before the police could separate us. A giant anarchist continually put himself in the firing line in front of the counter-protest, leading hand to hand fighting whenever the fascists broke through the police - he took punches from multiple people and carried on battling despite blood dripping from his nose.

The fash then began chucking more rocks and flares at us, but continued to be drowned out by our chanting. At around 9pm, the stewards decided to call an end to the counter-protest, leaving those of us that remained heavily outnumbered and under a barrage of missiles, and probably in danger of being overwhelmed without the police presence. Multiple people surrounding me took blows from rocks and coins thrown from the north side of Royal Parade, and hilariously, the fash brought out some fireworks - and hit themselves with them far more than they hit us.

Towards 10pm, the police forced the fash back up Armada Way, putting them out of projectile range. By half 10, we couldn't see them, and the remaining anti-fascist group began to thin out.

We held the square throughout, and the anarchist contingent was at the front ready to face them for the duration.

Anarchists in the Labor Movement #2

August 6, 2024

Second part in an ongoing series of interviews with anarchists involved in the labor movement. Originally posted to website of the Black Rose Anarchist Federation.

This is the second in a new series of serialized interviews that we are calling Anarchists in the Labor Movement. In this installment we bring you interviews with two nurses in the Southern United States.

As the title suggests, this series engages with anarchists who are active in workplace organizing. Some of those we speak to in this series are building a militant minority within the rank-and-file of their existing union, others are organizing the unorganized through new union campaigns, while others still are finding ways to build the capacity to win shop floor fights in contexts where union support is not available.

In part, our aim with these interviews is simply to shine a light on the presence of anarchist militants in the U.S. labor movement. More substantively, we ask participants to critically reflect on their experiences, including both successes and failures, to draw out generalizable lessons.

Some, but not all of those interviewed in this series are members of Black Rose / Rosa Negra.

Answers have been edited for clarity and length the piece, Hull would later see sprawling violence with "foreigners" being mobbed in their car and the Kurdish owners car lot next door being entirely trashed. As was a wide variety of small independent stores and chains such as Lush, Shoezone, O2 and Greggs.

Report posted to Organize Magazine, a publication of the Anarchist Federation about a mobilization in Preston on August 3rd:

Friday night, a message pops up in my (S's) local queer Discord server: a far right protest has been planned at the Preston Flag Market for tomorrow, and the council have put out a notice asking people to stay away and stay safe. Shortly after that, the Preston branch of Stop The War shared a poster for a counter-protest Unity Rally. Initially I had assumed this was organised by Stop The War Preston & South Ribble, but this was not stated on the poster, and they made it clear that they were just sharing this call to action. I decided I would go to the counter-protest and take my camera, to document what was happening in and to our communities. While I was scoping out the area and taking some test shots, I ran into a friend, another anarchist-feminist trans woman, and we spent the day together hanging out, helping someone in need, and shooting photos. These are some of the things we saw.

The far-right protest consisted mainly of a small group of younger people who occupied the Obelisk on the Market Square.

The counter-protest was about five times larger, and included members of the local branches of the Socialist Workers Party and Stand Up to Racism East Lancashire.

At one point, one of the protesters, donning a Union Jack flag as a cape, wandered through the space that had formed in the middle of the square, and started to taunt the counter-protesters. Police presence was moderate at this stage, and things were mostly calm. It felt more like a bunch of people standing around than a rally or demo. Which is fine, since we want peace in our communities. I didn't manage to hear what words were said, but eventually they stalked back over to their group.

Later on, the protesters kicked off. A few eggs were thrown, and a glass bottle, and at one point they ran off the Obelisk and down the side of Turtle Bay. Some banged on the windows in an attempt to smash them. At this point, the police took a more active role, and here we see a gaggle of officers bundling a protester into a van.

Everyone poured up the street from the square and onto an intersection on the main road. The movement was brisk but calm, right-wing agitators and left-wing locals woven together in the crowd.

Once the different groups had moved to the main road, they seemed to fragment again into little clusters dotted on all corners of the street, like party-goers sticking with their friends in a nightclub. The police tried to pull apart some of the different contingencies and keep people out of the road. Life went on calmly.

One of the protesters got a bit aggro with H: She baselessly accuses me of starting on her, attacking her. That tends to represent how a lot of transfemmes get attacked.

and splashed her with energy drink. The police moved in to pull our groups apart and try and restore some calm, even though my friend had been assaulted. To any established order, a nullifying peace is more desirable than a fight for radical justice.

A couple of officers chatting to a group on the other side of the street. For many people, it's not clear from their appearance what they believe or what they want. Throughout the day, some people engaged in constructive dialogue, or at least attempted to.

It makes me wonder how we can reconfigure protest / counter-protest events to facilitate discussion and prefiguration.

Later on, the most vocal of the protesters started to chant and rally their troops again, but their contingent was small. At this point the counter-protest had essentially dissipated, as the job of demonstrating the insignificance of the right-wing, both to them and their supporters, and to our community and ourselves, was mostly complete. Here we see some police officers recording video evidence of the protesters.

They decided to move on to the park, and H and I decided to follow them down and keep an eye on them. The police remained on the main road. Their demo was a fizzle, and I felt like we had leisurely chased them off.

Our Monster-wielding antagonist then appeared from across the street and attacked H:

She sprayed the entire contents of her can in my face, repeating her accusations from earlier. (Every accusation is a confession, after all). When I refused to cede any physical or verbal ground to her, she then began swinging without a second thought, initiating a physical confrontation.

I decided to stay back and document this, and record evidence - which worked, as the attacker's friends eventually convinced her, after several bouts in a car park, that she was incriminating herself.

The group moved off and dispersed before the police arrived; we heard talk of them reconvening in Avenham Park, but, thankfully, didn't see any evidence of this happening. We met up with someone else from the counter-protest and wandered down to the park together. We saw some of our agitators slide past us later on, shielding their faces from our biological and mechanical eyes. And then we just camped out on the grass, at the edge of a free party that was going on, popular. While in 2020, Harris attempted to appear as a bridge between the Dollar Store social democracy of Bernie Sanders and the Center-Right neoliberalism of Biden, by 2024, Harris had already walked back calls for things like universal healthcare, which of course, actually has mass support. There are many other examples, from turning their back on trans and LGBTQ+ rights, pushing for continued border militarization, and pivoting from calling for a version of the Green New Deal to pushing "cap and trade" schemes to shield corporations from climate fallout.

And despite Biden being pushed out of office in large part due to his unwavering support for the ongoing genocide in Palestine, the Democrats, while also rolling back COVID relief and healthcare protections, continue to fast-track billions in weapons and military aid to Israel. Cutting funding to Israel would swiftly end the war, which is deeply unpopular, especially among the Democratic base, yet the party remains deeply committed to supporting Israel's continued genocide. In short, many progressive voters are putting hopes in Harris being in fact something she is not.

Ironically, one of the largest co-signers of this continued right-wing shift has in fact been Bernie Sanders and "the Squad", who not only threw their support in with Biden, pushing back against growing calls to remove him, but have continued to fulfill their role, much like Kid Rock and Hulk Hogan in MAGA world, as a hype-man to the DNC, attempting to excite young people, the Left, and low-wage workers about a ticket that has by and large, abandoned any assemblage of "progressive" policy.

Thus, less than a decade after the Democratic Socialists of America (DSA) began a project of mass entryism into the Democratic Party, succeeding in gaining almost 100,000 members and getting several high profile candidates elected into office, the end result has by and large been a continued move to the Right. There is a word for this: recuperation.

Meanwhile, on the MAGA side of the street, Trump has attempted to piece together a campaign by building a brand around simply not being Joe Biden. But Trump has also gone to great lengths to obfuscate his policy proposals, insofar as he has them. This has been the most apparent in his attempt to re-imagine the overturning of Roe v. Wade as a way to "send it back to the states." But abortion is only part of a bigger issue for Trump, as popular opinion against Project 2025 has deeply soured, leading Trump to disavow the massive set of policy proposals produced by members of his former administration and backed by many of his most loyal subjects.

In short: Trump and the wider MAGA movement - in all of its factions - are attempting to sell themselves as a "better boss" for the country, while running from their very real and very unpopular plans for establishing a corporatized Christian theocracy. At the same time, the Democrats are lurching to the Right, while attempting to brand themselves in the baptism of "good vibes" rising from the base, which largely have materialized through the mirage that the Harris ticket is in fact progressive.

The recent response from Trump to a question about skyrocketing rent costs which has gone viral over the past week illustrates this point. Responding to a question from an attendee at the Sturgis motorcycle rally, Trump, speaking over the phone to a reporter at Fox News, replied that he would increase the amount of oil drilled, claiming that expanded petrol production would bring down energy costs and thus, lower the price of goods. Putting aside the fact that Trump is a real-estate tycoon and from the class of people who are literally creating the current housing crisis, the rise in the cost of everyday goods is driven chiefly by price gouging. And, since the 1970s, wages have been flattening while the cost of rent has risen astronomically. In short, more oil production won't bring down the cost of goods - but it will continue to make Trump and those of his class, very rich.

Even more ironically, despite running a platform that in theory at least addresses the existence of climate change, the Biden administration has pushed for more oil drilling than ever before, as the US now leads the world in oil production. But of course, the Democrats don't like to speak to this reality, at least to their base, who actually cares about the threat of climate change.

Both parties aren't running on anything. Instead, they're telling us a story they think we want to hear.

Signs of a Deep Rot

It's no surprise that after nearly a decade of intense struggle: mass strikes, uprisings, riots, mass mobilizations, the occupation of buildings, and growing mutual aid networks, the ruling class has come to embrace a set of increasingly reactionary and neofascist ideas. The political order wholesale has continue to move far to the Right.

There are differences. Just like during the civil rights era, where those on the Right attacked the movement as a stepping stone to "communism," in today's landscape, the "war on woke" is seen as a block against growing anti-capitalist sentiment and self-organization from below. Meanwhile, the neoliberals take a different route, putting pronouns in their Twitter bios and posing for choreographed "take a knee" photo-shoots while sending in the National Guard against protesters. One side pushes conspiracy theories about Martin Luther King, Jr., the other quotes him while indicting bail funds on RICO charges.

As we step back and look at the electoral political landscape, we see this reality come into focus. The Democrats are carrying out a genocide in Palestine while campaigning to the right of the GOP on immigration. Harris placates protesters while hinting at a possible ceasefire, as children huddling in bombed out schools are murdered en masse in Gaza. At a campaign rally, Trump shouts-out white nationalist influencers and touts his Vice Presidential pick who is financed by reactionary Silicon Valley billionaires and influenced by Alt-Right podcasters who literally advocate for a monarchy.

Meanwhile, the largest third party in the US, the uber-capitalist Libertarian Party, which is controlled by the far-Right Mises Caucus, is largely backing Trump, as RFK Jr., the most popular third party candidate, advocates an escalated assault on Gaza and cultivates support among crunchy Qanon stans and anti-vaxxers.

The ruling class is hoping to bury the uptick in class struggle over the past decade using everything from conspiracy charges to conspiracy theories. The message to partisans of the mass eruptions of popular anger and action that have exploded over the last few years against capitalism, white supremacy, and war should be clear: we can't win at this game.

The feeling held by many that both major political parties do not represent their interests is correct. Our true power lies in our ability to organize and act outside of the established State system, in our own interests.

Influencers of the World, Unite

Just as we have come to expect, the liberals and so-called "socialists" of groups like Party for Socialism and Liberation (PSL) are all rushing toward the electoral spectacle. Some of these groups, specifically liberals, are repeating the line that American institutions are the only way to defeat authoritarianism, as long as the people they like are the ones giving the police their orders. The "socialists," which are just reformist liberals with red flags, have become a parody of themselves; embracing electoralism, with increasingly absurd arguments about "visibility" to back them up as they run their hopeless, wasteful, Quixotic campaigns for president. Not only are all of these attempts repetitions of failed movement strategies of the past, not only do they rely on approaches that give our power away to others, but these are all approaches which engage the state at its point of greatest strength, and at the point of our greatest weakness.

Not to be out done, much of the online Left is lining up lock and step behind the Democratic Party. Progressive streamers like David Pakman applaud Vice President Harris "shutting down" so-called "hecklers" who would dare to remind us of dead Palestinians. "Socialist" streamers like Vaus call the current Democratic ticker "based," as everything is reduced to pumping out viral click-bait and online content, which for streamers amounts to actual dollars. Pathetic.

To be clear: this is not a call for shitting on people excited about change. It is a reminder that we must intervene and say what only we can say. Instead of pretending we have a dog in this race, we should be pointing out how deeply flawed this entire spectacle is. Regardless of if we vote are not, more critically, we should be putting our energies into building new forms of popular organization, infrastructure, and action from below which can challenge and push back against the systems of exploitation and domination which are threatening life on this planet.

We should be centering the social movements and struggles which actually have the ability to improve our lives and communities and also point towards new forms of life. This work is hard, often dangerous, and won't win us many Patreon subscribers or YouTube followers, but it is the task before us.

The Task Ahead

Each cycle, political parties attempt to pull into their orbit antagonistic currents which seek to change society in an effort to gain power. Obama smashed the Occupy encampments and sent in the military against Standing Rock and then talked about the "99%." Biden invoked the memory of Heather Heyer and the fight against fascism as members of his party applaud the indicting of Cop City protesters on RICO charges and the police assassination of Tortuguita in the Weelaunee forest. Now, Harris and Walz are making overtures about a ceasefire while the Biden administration continues to facilitate a genocide.

Every apparent nod to our demands is an attempt at recuperating the disillusioned back into the fold for another round of the same nonsense, where no matter who wins, we lose. What often seems as a betrayal of the "soul" or "values" of a party, system, or nation-state is simply the organization functioning as intended. The elite project of co-optation depends on short memory spans, distraction, and threats to keep voters returning to the trough of so-called representative democracy every few years. For those feeling alienated by it all, you're not wrong. Trust yourself, not the pundits or the candidates. They don't care about you, why should you care about them? The difference is that they need you for their game to work, but you don't need them to get free.

Despite the allure of "vibes," most of us know deep-down that regardless of who wins the election, as soon as they step into office, the mood will shift. Despite Trump's populist veneer, his loyalty is to himself and those of the billionaire class, while he attempts to carry out a deeply unpopular authoritarian program. Harris will continue to support the ongoing genocide by Israel, in the face of growing anger at rising costs and climate chaos. Just as under Obama, what manufactured "hope" people have placed in the possibility of a Harris/Walz administration will soon be dashed by the realities that this is America.

The question for those involved in autonomous social movements is, where will we be? Ready and poised, with networks of action, education, solidarity, and infrastructure - to engage those disillusioned, just as many of us once were, at the failures of the electoral system, or caught off guard, when it fails to deliver and functions, exactly as intended.

The Opening Statement – Summer 2024

An older man started asking me if I work. I answered yes, then he shouted something along the lines of "And you want your taxes to pay for the invaders". I answered "Yes" and shouted that they're "selfish c*nts." Another guy said he wasn't selfish, that he was fighting for his grandkids. Who was I helping? I shouted back that I'd help anyone, everyone I could.

My friend said they could smell smoke. I sniffed. It smelt of chemicals, closer to smoke from fireworks than of wood fires. A man, on his way to rushing up to the police line, saw us and ran up. He said he'd seen one of our guys hit and his glasses had been knocked off. "I have them. Can you get them to him?" I said yes and he pressed the glasses into my hand. I thanked him and he ran down the street to riot.

A woman ran up to us. I thought I recognized her from last year, participating in a demo led by Alec Yerbury, a split from Patriotic Alternative. She said we had to get out of here, that we weren't safe, why were we among them. She said to come with her to the police. We ran back down Jameson Street, to the edge of the square where we'd been stood. "Protect them" she shouted at the cops. The cop responded with an abrupt "No" and that they couldn't "waste resources."

We ended up circling back around along roads that seemed to have quietened, to further up Jameson Street, where our comrades were waiting for us. Everyone was safe. The police had shoved them, shouted at them to run, saying "They will kill you!" so all of the counter-protestors except the two of us had run up Jameson Street ahead of the rioters.

We briefly went down Jameson Street to see the riot going on. It wasn't an structured line between police and rioters, but instead just a cluster of noise and action. There were a couple of funny conversations we had with the Right, where they started trying to debate us - "define what racism is" - then having a go that we couldn't have a "reasonable discussion," all in the middle of a riot with us splattered with eggs and flour that their compatriots had thrown at us.

Here our action ends. We retreated, established where everyone was and left in groups. An International Carnival was scheduled for today; it was meant to parade through the city centre but the police had rerouted it yesterday and then ordered for the parade to be cancelled completely today. We joined its starting point out of the city centre, where it was being held as a stationary event instead.

News and social media showed that the rioting continued all day and into the night. In the city centre, fires were being set, shops smashed and looted. There it looked possible that it had morphed into more generic looting and rioting, whereas there were a set of fascists who targeted a hotel housing refugees, then moved up Ferensway and then headed down Spring Bank, where many Muslims and people of colour live, including a mosque.

When we had walked past the mosque on our way out of the city centre, there were many local men standing ready to defend it, with three cops to the side. When two of us were circling back into the city centre to retrieve my friend's bike, we glimpsed a crowd of around 30 rioters making their way up Ferensway, led by a man wearing a England flag shirt and a traffic cone on each arm.

Reflection:

The police response was surprising. I'm sure for Leftists in other cities, the aggression of the police towards us would be expected, but at previous Hull anti-fascist protests they've been far more reasonable and seemingly sympathetic towards us. Strange decisions were made - turning up long after the fascists had begun their rally, no preparation for a riot despite news from elsewhere in the country - and then I think their loss of control caused them to become more aggressive and emotional than I've seen previously. A riot is unprecedented in Hull and this must have affected the police response. Also, there was no one on our side who had established rapport (or were able to) with the police. In previous actions I've attended, the Trades Union Council have taken a lead in organising and - not being far left - they were able to communicate with the police more easily than us.

It was disappointing how outnumbered we were. I'm impressed at how many anti-fascists attended on less than 24 hours notice, but there were between 300-500 at the far right rally. This is many more than any far right demo I've seen in Hull. However, I think the organisers wanted to achieve an obviously Right-wing, but dignified protest. John Francis was pictured wearing a "Stop the Boats" shirt. The Queen Vic statue and platform were covered in British and England flags. I think they wanted a show of strength and controlled aggression, to embolden everyone else in the city who could agree with them. It's true that violent right-wingers will be emboldened. I fear were going to see an increase in hate crimes. At a bar where one of my friends works, the next day someone called asking if the staff were of English ancestry.

But they ended up on drunken, deranged riots, causing a lot of damage to the city that won't disappear quickly. I think most of the general population are afraid and horrified. I expect there are people who are socially right-wing and could be sympathetic to the "Stop the Boats," "Muslim grooming gangs" talking points, but who would be horrified that local Muslim areas have actually been terrorised. Many people are going to be afraid. In the coming days and weeks, I'm planning to participate in clean-ups. (Re)building solidarity and community could be more important than the action of a counter-demo.

Editors Note. As mentioned in complied (too much) with the police, letting them through to the hotel to use the toilets (even though we weren't allowed in ourselves). As they built their numbers around us we remained linked arm in arm by the hotel doors through to sunset.

The night ended violently. Another group of fascists—the police—decided bully tactics were the way to disperse us. They randomly targeted one comrade in a mask, enforcing section 60, singling them out and grabbing them by the arm to pull them from the group. We pulled the comrade back into the group, but by that point, the cops decided to swarm us. Countless officers split the group in two, pushing most of us closer to the fascists despite telling us our 'safe' exit was in the opposite direction. Most officers fell into line, oblivious about what had happened, confused and unsure what to do next. After another 15-minute stand-off with the police, we fanned out knowing we had done our job successfully.

We the people defended our city on Saturday. Not the cops, not the politicians. What was likely an organised pogrom attempt by fascists was fended off by the Bristol community linked arm in arm. The shoddy police response is another example that they are never the safety or protection they claim to be. On Saturday, we showed the power of our community.

We stand ready and prepared to do it again. We will show fascists they will always be outnumbered, they will never be welcome here, and they should be scared to show their faces.

Report posted to Organize Magazine, a publication of the Anarchist Federation about a mobilization in Hull on August 3rd:

Promo for the counter-demo only began - as far as I'm aware - on Friday. A friend (member of the Hull Communist Group) messaged me that the fascist rally was happening. We had a look at the promo from the fascists: a facebook event called "Enough is Enough", shared to a group called the "Hull Patriotic Protestors", and seemingly mostly led by someone called John Francis. It said their rally began at 12:00, so we decided on 11:30. He kept me updated as he made a quick poster and sent it to the SWP and Co-operation Hull. I shared it with friends, with a Queer group and to a friend who's part of the Hull anti-raids group.

I arrived at Queen Vic Square a little before 11:30, with three comrades alongside. One of us recognised members of the Stand Up to Racism / SWP group, so we joined up with them. When we got to the square there were already between 50-100 of the fascists rallied, with flags and speakers making speeches on the platform. There were no police. Since there were less than 10 of us at this moment, we didn't want to draw attention to ourselves. More people started joining us: individuals who had come alone, Co-operation Hull's group, a small group my friend spotted with a "Hope not Hate" placard in the crowd. The University's RCP group also arrived. I think we ended up with 60-70 people in total.

While we were gathering, due to their numbers growing into the hundreds and the police being absent, we kept a lower profile, holding up our banners and placards but not beginning chants or songs yet. We took position on the benches at the edge of the square. At 12:00, the police van turned up and they ran out, forming a ring around the fascists. None of them had any riot gear. The SWP began setting up the speakers they'd brought and we began our chants. This grabbed the Far Right's attention. A sea of faces turned towards us as we shouted "Refugees are welcome here."

The first egg hit my friend in the eye. He spoke to a police liaison officer to make sure they were aware. No reaction from them. More and more eggs started being thrown - clearly some of fascists had come prepared to throw food at people. I got showered with a sack of flour at one point. There was a point where they seemed to run out of eggs and that's when random food (oranges, chips) started being tossed at us, along with cans of beer and plastic bottles.

Individuals from the Far Right also kept getting through the police line to get into our group, to shove or threaten us. The police would tow each one away and deposit them back at the rally to the cheers of their mates. At one point, one of them appeared behind my friend, put his hand in their hair and said "You want to take a walk with me." This man was later seen assaulting an elderly man when the riot started and is a known local thug.

Timings were a complete blur at the time, but around 12:30-12:40, a group of them trickled out from the police line and gathered round to the right hand side of us. I ran over to hold our line. This was how the riot began. In moments, many of them were pouring over to that side, clustering behind us where Paragon Street meets Vic square. Police were rushing to meet them. The rioters aggression began to focus on the cops. There was a moment of chaos and then police were shoving and grabbing my friend and me, shouting "Walk". We did, but our comrades had vanished and the two of us were suddenly in the riot, surrounded by the people we'd been facing off moments before. They were running down Jameson Street, where a new police line seemed to have formed ahead of us. We tried heading down there, but there was clearly no way of crossing the clashing rioters and cops. To either side of us, shopkeepers were locking their doors. I was wearing an ancom flag and held a placard saying "The murderer was not a refugee" as well as both of us having been very visible on the demo, so we didn't completely avoid their attention. I remember a young woman screaming at me that the murder was a migrant. I shouted back that he was Welsh.

Abolitionist greetings and happy summer!

The theme of this issue of The Opening Statement is digital surveillance under capitalism. We all know that states are always spying on us; cops and guards monitor, arrest, and infiltrate us; prosecutors investigate and frame us; corporations steal our data to make money off us; and so on and so forth. We also know that surveillance in all its forms can be extremely profitable: data about our phone calls, emails, credit card purchases, etc., are bought and sold to the highest bidder. And as the global crisis of the present intensifies in all its forms—resurgent fascism; climate catastrophe; hyperpolicing, militarization, and global war; poverty of the many alongside extreme wealth of the few—we expect all forms of repression, including surveillance, to intensify as well. As a result, we think it's worth taking up this theme again and thinking about what we can do to try to keep ourselves safe.

Prisons may be the place where surveillance by the state and corporations is most apparent. From the ground up, prisons are designed to monitor and control prisoners; they are trying to keep you all from talking to each other and building relationships, while also cutting you off from your families and supporters on the outside. The three articles we include in this issue look at the relatively ubiquitous communication technologies like phones, tablets, and e-communications offered by companies like Securus (operated by a company called Aventiv) and GTL (which changed its name to ViaPath). According to a recent article in The Appeal, these two companies "dominate roughly 80 percent of the U.S. prison telecom industry, forming an effective duopoly that thrives on the captive markets found inside the nation's lockups." They contract with 43 state prison systems and over 800 county jails. Their almost complete control of the market allows them to charge prisoners and families exorbitant rates for their services. Even if the products they sell are lifelines to the outside world, it's important to talk about the role they play in facilitating surveillance and in gouging their captive user base.

The first article, "Do Children Have a 'Right to Hug' Their Parents?," is an abbreviated version of a long essay that was printed in the New Yorker in May. It discusses something we mentioned in the news roundup of the last issue of TOS: the lawsuits against Michigan's Genesee and St. Clair counties for their deals with Securus and GTL that provide "financial incentives" for jails to eliminate in-person visits in order to force prisoners to use these companies' digital products. Not only do the companies charge prisoners exorbitant fees to communicate with their families, they also use prisoners as "experimental subjects" for the development of new surveillance technologies. The article explores the emotional impact of these policies on family members, especially children, who have been cut off from their incarcerated parents. It also describes some of the "surveillance products" the companies market to prisons.

The second article, originally published in The Intercept in 2019, looks at the voice recognition technologies and voice-print databases developed by companies like Securus. These technologies help prison authorities monitor prisoners' private communications and map out communication networks to reveal who is talking to whom, both in-side and outside of prison walls. One of the implications that the article points out is that this technology could be used to "coordinate crackdowns against prison organizing campaigns." Moreover, because prisons are often used as laboratories for behavior modification and surveillance tools before they are rolled out for the free world, this "new" technology will almost certainly be used sooner or later on both sides of the walls.

The third article looks at Securus/Aventiv and GTL/ViaPath from a financial angle. As a result of debts and the financial pressures of coming price caps, GTL/ViaPath is desperately trying to refinance its loans while Securus/Aventiv is trying to sell itself—if it can't find a buyer, it might have to declare bankruptcy. We see a few of takeaways from this article: 1) corporations continue to exploit the growing market of prisons; 2) outsourcing communications to corporations benefits jail/prison administrators while ultimately harming prisoners and their loved ones; 3) even companies as big and as powerful as these have serious economic vulnerabilities that activists could potentially target; and 4) it's unclear how prisoners will maintain communication with their loved ones if these companies do collapse. We don't know how this will play out, but we'll be keeping our eyes on this.

On a related note, back in TOS Issue 9 in Spring 2019, we published an editorial explaining why MAPS doesn't use JPay (which is owned by Securus). If you missed it and would like to read it, write to us and we will send you a reprint. Sometimes folks write to us asking if we'll communicate with them on JPay instead of sending handwritten letters, and we totally understand the request—it can be easier, cheaper, and faster to send an electronic message. For us, though, the downsides outweigh the upsides. We see JPay as a way for companies to turn prisoners into profits and as a means for guards and administrators to more easily monitor prisoners' communications.

As always, we're interested in your thoughts about these articles. What is your experience using communication services? Do these prices seem fair? Has the cost increased in recent years, and if so how much? Do you find something useful or worthwhile about these technologies in spite of their problems? What is happening with in-person visits in the prison where you're being held? How did the COVID-19 pandemic impact communications and surveillance?

And now for the news roundup. First, an article by Paul Egan in the May 13 issue of the Detroit Free Press describes an "employee database" that MDOC was required to create to log "complaints related to sexual assault allegations made against [guards] by prisoners." The article focuses on one officer in particular, who worked at Richard A. Handlon C.F. from 2000 to his retirement in 2019, and whose record was especially terrible, with more than 60 complaints against him. In spite of this, the guard in question was never disciplined by MDOC or interviewed by police. The evidence discussed in the article comes from a lawsuit on behalf of six current or former prisoners at Handlon who say that this guard sexually assaulted them. Unfortunately, because the article focuses so much attention on a single guard, it implies that the problem is one of "bad apples" rather than a structural feature of the prison system, which encourages this kind of behavior and ensures impunity. Actually, the article indirectly acknowledges that the problem does go beyond this one guard, when it notes that his "more than 60 entries" were "more than twice as many as anyone else on the list"—which suggests that other MDOC guards, who go unmentioned in the article, have been accused of as many as 30 sexual assaults! This only confirms that the prison produces sexual violence, rather than protecting anyone from it.

For another article in the Free Press published on April 18, reporter Violet Ikononova conducted a "first-of-its-kind" investigation into shootings by Detroit police in recent years. She found that, between 2015-2021, Detroit cops shot 30 people nonfatally, and a third of their victims were never charged with or convicted of "the conduct officers said prompted them to open fire." In other words, the cops probably shot people and then lied about it. As Julie Hurwitz, a civil rights attorney who represented one of the survivors, told Ikononova, what the cops accuse the people they shoot of "is made up and is used as a justification for shooting them." The article also documents the fact that Detroit police have shot more than 125 people (fatally and nonfatally) since 2011, an average of around nine people per year, and none of the cops involved has been charged in any of these shootings. Is anybody surprised? We sure aren't.

On June 17, MDOC published a press release announcing changes to housing units at three prisons: Baraga, Chippewa, and Oaks. One of the changes is to reopen a Level II housing unit at Chippewa that has been closed (three more housing units there will remain closed); another is to transition a Level II housing unit at Oaks to Level IV; and finally, an 88-bed housing unit at Baraga will be closed. MDOC states that the closure at Baraga "reflects a continued decline in the state's administrative segregation population," but it seems like the main reason they are doing it is to address staffing shortages, since the closure will mean that "22.75 fewer officers" are required to operate the facility. Yet opening the unit at Chippewa will increase staffing needs by "10.5." Overall, they claim that "these changes will result in a net increase of 72 active beds in the MDOC." We thought this was important to highlight because MDOC administrators are always bragging about how the prison population is declining, but these changes seem to point in the opposite direction. If you're being held at one of these facilities, have you heard about these changes? What do you make of what's going on? How will they meet the call for increased staffing at Chippewa, which is already facing a staff shortage?

On July 3, the president of the union representing MDOC guards demanded that Governor Whitmer deploy the Michigan National Guard to "to provide immediate custody support to prisons." Paul Egan reported in the Free Press that Byron Osborn, president of the Michigan Corrections Organization cited understaffing, excess overtime, mass resignations, and the removal of hiring incentives as justification for this dangerous demand. Unsurprisingly, Egan's article does not quote a single prisoner about how they feel about understaffing across MDOC or about what bringing in the National Guard would mean for them and their loved ones.

On May 13, the Newberry News reported that charges were officially dismissed against two MDOC guards who were involved in the 2019 death of John Lancaster, who was imprisoned at Alger at the time. The two guards were moving Lancaster from an observation cell when he died from extreme dehydration. They join six others who had been charged in Lancaster's death, but whose charges were dismissed last year. Once again, from the perspective of the state, it's no accident, no crime, when the prison kills—because it's doing what it's meant to. We extend our deepest sympathies to the family and loved ones of John Lancaster. Though we know true justice can't come from the same legal system that locks up our loved ones, we can't imagine how painful it must be to see an opportunity for accountability be dismissed this way.

Outside of Michigan, at Angola prison in Louisiana, prisoners have for decades been forced to do agricultural labor for little or no pay (the maximum wage is 2 cents an hour), even in extreme heat. On Despite clear confusion and a lack of communication between different groups of police trying to send us in opposite directions, we eventually left the Redcliffe Hill area, and quietly disbanded, blending back into the now quiet night of the city we live in and love so much.

We want to drive that point home: the media and politicians and police will talk about "protestors" and "the public" as though they're two mutually exclusive groups of people. We are the public. This city is our home, and the people who live in it, of every race, ethnicity and religion are our neighbors and friends. So too are the residents of the Mercure Hotel. Bristol welcomes migrants and refugees, and we will fight for them if we have to.

Yesterday showed the power and importance of community self-defense. Normal Bristolians put themselves in harms way to protect their neighbors in the Mercure hotel, and we stopped a violent, racist mob from doing harm to the families inside. The police were beyond useless, and it was the bravery, moral conviction, and community solidarity of the antifascist counter-protestors that kept the fascists at bay.

Again, we are the public. Outside of this we're normal boring people, with normal boring lives, and normal boring jobs. Antifascism is and must be a community effort, and as this flare-up of far-Right violence continues, we are going to need everyone to step up and do their part to keep our communities safe around the country.

Every day is the Battle of Cable Street. Keep fighting it. Always Antifascist. No Pasaran. Love and Solidarity Forever. Bristol Antifascists.

Report on mobilization on August 3rd in Bristol from anarchist newspaper Freedom:

Castle Park in central Bristol was already bustling when we arrived early, about 700 of us according to Bristol Antifascists. The word was that fascists had already tried to start fights with locals. About an hour into our counter-protest, we caught wind of their arrival and moved in large groups to the entrances by Bristol Bridge and Temple Meads station at the edges of the Park. They were spotted arriving from the east so we marched up to face them, about 50 yards behind a thin line of police horses and officers with batons.

The fascists hadn't anticipated how many of us would show up, but they arrived drunk, angry and looking to fight. Proving to them that they were outnumbered, we chanted "We are many, you are few. We are Bristol, who are you?!"

They were eventually charged by police horses, but roughly 100-200 fascists moved to convene on the hill. We held our ground facing a shower of glass bottles, cans of beer and rocks. A couple of times I watched anti-fascists blocking cans from hitting police officers standing between us.

We fired into action, coming to the aid of a black man who was attacked, and running down to Bristol Bridge to make sure they couldn't spread any further. I watched police on horses shocked and confused at the spread of the crowd, completely inept at dealing with the fascists. I watched my friend face down a police officer with an attack dog, strategically lost in the spread of people around him. We pushed the fascists down High Street, St Nicholas Street and Bristol Bridge until they were bottle-necked and out of steam. After a while, we realised that the police had held them in the exact direction they wanted to go—towards the Mercure Hotel currently housing refugees.

With the police in the way, we, now less than half our original number, sprinted through the streets of Bristol, chanting "Bristol is antifascist" while onlookers ate restaurant food, round through Queens Square and over the bridge to Redcliffe. Comrades handed out bottles of water and energy bars to each other on the way, checking in on each other, keeping close as we weaved through traffic.

I'll never forget what I saw when we arrived—after hearing reports police were planning to protect the hotel with vans and riot officers—a small line of antifascists linked arm in arm at the door had made it there first. Cops on bicycles were trying to catch up with us, but no other police were in sight. For about 30 minutes we cheered, with the refugees thanking us through the windows of their rooms. They were overjoyed—children and parents were waving and smiling and making hearts out of their hands to us. I cried. "Refugees are welcome here", we chanted. We weren't sure if the fash would show up, but sure enough, they trudged their way up the hill towards us.

We formed lines to ready ourselves, standing shoulder to shoulder as tight as possible to ensure they wouldn't make it through. A comrade behind me got hit in the head with a can. Another next to me got punched in the face. One fascist, who had blood gushing down his already-red face, led the pack from the road to try and get to the hotel door, but never made it through. We defended ourselves and each other and the hotel, and we would've continued if we needed to. The moments flash by in my memory—it certainly didn't feel like 15-20 minutes, it felt like it was over in minutes before police horses arrived again.

That intense attack was the last time we came into contact with one of the groups of fascists, but we still had the police to deal with. After hours of letting the fascists linger on the side of the road, with us stood firm on the other side, the police eventually formed a semi-circle around us. Local Green Party councillors worked with the police to tell us it was safe to leave, that the police had it covered and had pushed the fash back to Temple Meads. But after the ineptitude of the police response until then, about 50 of us stayed steadfast. We these families.

Disorganised, incompetent and hopelessly outnumbered by fascists, Avon and Somerset Police and the other forces brought in from outside the area would have, if left to their own devices yesterday, allowed a pogrom to happen.

At this stage everyone is familiar with the murders of Bebe, Elsie and Alice in Southport on Monday (29th August 2024). Our hearts are broken for these little girls and their families and loved ones. We cannot imagine the pain they are suffering at this time. We wish a speedy recovery to the other children and adults injured and traumatized by this attack.

Far-Right and fascist groups are using this tragedy, and the categorically false story that the attacker was a migrant or asylum seeker and a Muslim as an excuse to carry out violent pogroms against those members of our communities around the country.

Bristol Antifascists and our comrades joined a static, peaceful, counter-protest of around 700 people at 6pm at Castle Park. Throughout this hour small groups of fascists and far-Right attempted to provoke or even attack people around the edges of the protest. By around 7pm a larger group of around 100-200 fascists had gathered nearby in Castle Park. The fascists had clearly been drinking all day, and full of Dutch courage were keen on violence, attempting to March directly into the static-counter protest next to St Nicholas' Church.

What ensued was a series of attacks against the static protest by fascists as they repeatedly broke through the hopelessly thin police lines. We faced full cans of beer and cider, glass bottles, and large stones being thrown and a series of direct physical assaults by groups of pissed-up and coked-up wannabe hard men, who were repeatedly sent packing by far better organized counter-protestors and antifascists. Even with horses and attack dogs, the police were far too outnumbered and far too disorganized to effectively control the fascists, and collective self defense was the only thing keeping everybody safe.

Eventually the fascists had retreated to Bristol Bridge. Knowing that they were believed to be intending to head to Redcliffe Hill, where the Mercure Hotel housing migrant families is located, a quick decision was made by a total of around 200-250 counter-protestors to head around via Queen Square to the Hotel to protect it.

When we arrived the police were all but completely absent, with a handful of cops on bicycles who had followed us being the only visible presence. Conscious of our potentially scary appearance to residents at the hotel, we made certain to demonstrate our solidarity and love for them, with waves, thumbs up, and heart signs exchanged between antifascists and residents of the hotel. It was really notable just how many of the residents are very young, primary school aged children. The downstairs lobby windows are covered with kids' drawings and paintings.

A group of counter-protestors formed a line and linked arms across the hotel entrance while still more of us formed into a tight bloc on the grassy area in front of the hotel. After about 30 minutes a group of around 80-100 fascists, who had broken away from the police on Bristol Bridge, marched up Redcliffe Hill and immediately began to attack us outside the hotel. Again, the police were wildly outnumbered and unable to effectively defend themselves, let alone anyone else.

For a sustained period of around 15-20 minutes, antifascists stood firm, defending ourselves and each other from a constant, intense assault of fists, kicks, bottles and stones thrown at us by fascists intent on attacking the hotel and its residents. The handful of police present flailed, hitting people seemingly at random with batons, and occasionally PAVA-spraying groups of people.

When police enforcements finally arrive in the form of attack dogs, horses and extra officers, the fascists lost their bottle and retreated to the other side of Redcliffe Hill. They remained there in rapidly dwindling numbers, occasionally hurling the odd insult or glass bottle at the counter-protestors, but ultimately unable to muster another attempt at attacking the hotel.

The majority of the 200-250 counter protestors stayed outside the hotel to protect it until around 9pm when Green Party Bristol City Councillors who had begun encouraging people to leave telling them that the police would now have the situation under control. Bristol Antifascists want to make it clear: this was wrong of them. The police had demonstrated a total lack of ability to defend the people housed in the Mercure Hotel or to contain the fascist threat in our city. There was still the potential for fascists to regroup and try again to attack the hotel. Around 50-60 people chose to stay at the hotel as it got dark. We'd received a request from parents inside the hotel to keep things quiet as they were putting young children to bed, and we happily obliged.

At around 10pm, as larger numbers of police arrived at the hotel, those of us remaining decided the time was right to quietly leave as a group and then disperse in a safe area in town. However, this wasn't before the police decided to reassert their authority after a frankly humiliating day for them. While people were largely sat quietly on the grass or stood around chatting in front of the hotel entrance, a group of cops in riot get suddenly pushed their way to the front of the hotel, hitting, shoving and shouting at counter-protestors for no apparent reason. Fine. Let them believe they're in charge. Whatever keeps them quiet.

June 18, reports Nick Chrastil for The Lens, lawyers representing Angola prisoners "urged a federal judge to halt operations of the Farm Line any time the heat index rises above 88 degrees." This month, the heat, exacerbated by climate change, is expected to soar to unsafe levels, exposing prisoners to "serious risk of injury or death." "When prisoners are forced to work on the Farm Line, they are rarely given breaks or drinking water and lack necessary equipment, their lawyers said. Also, many incarcerated people have medical conditions that make them vulnerable to heat related illness—but they are not exempt from work on even the hottest days." According to the legal filing, "the officers who oversee the Farm Line used to ride horses, but no longer do. Prisoners contend that the practice was ended in order to protect the horses from the 'blistering' heat" (if this sounds like slavery to you, we agree). On July 2, a federal judge issued a temporary restraining order requiring prison officials to immediately institute a variety of protections from the heat for Farm Line workers. The broader class-action lawsuit to end forced labor altogether is scheduled for September.

We also wish to offer some updates from the global struggle against imperialism that is being taken up by colonized people across the world. In the last issue we wrote about Israel's ongoing genocide in Palestine, as well as the mass displacement, starvation, and war underway in Sudan and the Congo. The mass displacement and death in all of these places continue. In this issue, we turn to Kanaky, or so-called "New Caledonia," an archipelago of islands in the South Pacific between Australia and Fiji that has been under French colonial control since 1853. On May 13, 2024, protests broke out in the capital, Nouméa, after the French parliament passed electoral reforms allowing French residents who have lived in the territory for just 10 years or more to vote. These residents are, by and large, white and not Indigenous Melanesian or Polynesian people. This would tip the balance of local elections away from the 41 percent of Indigenous Kanak people living on the islands in favor of white residents, both those descended from earlier white settlers and this recent wave of European tourists-turned-residents. Though the French parliament claimed this move would "improve democracy," many Indigenous Kanak people see it as undermining their right to self-determination. Protests escalated into violent clashes in the capital city and throughout the territory between predominantly white settlers, settler-run police forces, and Indigenous Kanak youth, six of whom were killed. From 16,732 kilometers away, France closed the Nouméa airport and deployed 3,500 French cops and soldiers to the city to violently suppress the uprisings. According to a report published on the French-language blog Sans Nom and translated into English by Abolition Media, many Indigenous Kanaky have been injured (although the French authorities are refusing to count them) and several "have lost an eye or have the bones of their faces shattered following police flash ball shots, others have gunshot wounds and are in a coma." Arrests and "disappearances" of Kanaky people have also begun to rise, with at least 726 people in police custody, 115 referrals to court, and 60 committal warrants since the protests began. Seven independence activists were not only arrested but also deported to mainland France for pre-trial detention. This has sparked protests in Paris as well, once again raising the colonial question in France.

But the protests are not just about voting rights—they're also about colonial capitalist mining. The Sans Nom report continues: "New Caledonia has a quarter of the world's nickel reserves, exploited in open-pit mines, to supply three pyrometallurgical processing plants. The first two produce ferronickel, a lower-quality mixture used in stainless steel, and the third produces battery-grade nickel (mainly intended for Tesla since 2021)." In the months leading up to the change in voting eligibility, France had been negotiating a "Nickel Pact" with the New Caledonian government in an effort to intensify the extraction of nickel for the French market. The politics of these negotiations are complicated: there are the interests of the French state, a fraction of Kanak elites loyal to France, and another elite fraction that favors independence and hopes to use extensive nickel mining to achieve it. But mining wealth has never trickled down to the Kanak poor and urban youth, who make up the majority of the rebels in the streets. Mining has also caused widespread environmental devastation, polluting rivers, increasing landslides, and exacerbating health problems. As a result, the rebels "are beginning to advocate an independence that would drive out the French state but also the mines." Much like the situation in the Congo, which we discussed in the last issue, here too valuable minerals—in this case, nickel for use in electric vehicle batteries—are at the heart of this conflict, and they also explain France's desire to maintain its colonial rule over Kanak territory. More generally, in keeping with the theme of this issue, it's important to remember that the tablets, video kiosks, and cell phones we use day in and day out are powered by these minerals. Our devices aren't only surveillance apparatuses—they're also soaked in blood.

On June 18, 2024, Kenyan President William Ruto proposed a controversial finance bill that would have introduced higher taxes on daily items and services including internet data, fuel, bank transfers, bread, and diapers. The bill would also allow the Kenyan state to collect citizens' personal data from bank accounts and digital money apps, undermining digital privacy laws (surveillance capitalism turned into state surveillance). Youth in the capital, Nairobi, began to organize mass demonstrations. Protesters are fed up not only with Ruto, but also the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which has been enforcing resource extraction and austerity across the African subcontinent since the 1980s, under so-called "structural adjustment programs." In this imperialist scheme worthy of the dirtiest loan shark, impoverished nations are given loans under repayment terms they can never meet. Then the IMF dictates how the economy must run and how people can live—or more likely die. In Kenya, corruption runs wild while the IMF demands that the people suffer to repay the loans. Kenyan officials pay themselves at the highest rate relative to cost of living of any nation in the world. The youth have had enough.

In response to their protests, Ruto deployed the police who killed 22 protestors in a week, while over 50 people have been arrested. A Member of Parliament, outspoken in support of the protesters, was abducted in broad daylight. According to Al Jazeera, over 300 people have been treated and discharged from hospitals with protest-related injuries. Some badass youth stole horses from the police, and others smoked tear gas like it was a vape (their lungs must be coated with diamonds). People stormed the Kenyan parliament and successfully drove police out of their neighborhoods chanting “we are peaceful!” Under popular pressure, Ruto announced on June 26 that he would not sign the bill, but youth continue to mobilize, demanding Ruto’s resignation in response to the murders of protestors. Protests spread from Nairobi to the cities of Mombasa, Eldoret, and Kisumu. Now, in domino fashion, there are protests planned, or feared, in Uganda, Nigeria, Zimbabwe, and other African countries that have suffered decades of imperialist oppression via the IMF.

As always, please write with any information you wish to share about suspended programming, parole board delays, new policies, mail and book censorship, staff shortages, difficulty in accessing programs, commissary inflation, and anything else you think needs to be shared. We’ve heard that some guards are messing with people’s halal meals—is this something you or anyone you know have experienced as well? If so, we would be very interested to hear more about what’s going on. We would also like to invite anyone who is an illustrator or visual artist to send us artwork that we might include in future issues. Some future topics and themes for TOS that have come up recently in our conversations and correspondence are prison infrastructure, the prisoner benefit fund, climate change, and analysis and critiques of the “good time” bill. What topics do you want to see us cover? What information or news do you want to read? Finally, would you or someone you know be interested in a Spanish edition of TOS, or figuring out ways to include some articles in Spanish? Write to us and let us know.

As Texas Antifascist Found “Not Guilty,” Billionaire GOP Mega-Donor Reportedly Bankrolling Lawsuit for Fascist, Anti-Semitic Group

August 10, 2024

On Thursday, August 8th, Chris “Big Tex,” was found not guilty by a jury in a criminal trial on charges of “assault on a police officer,” following a mobilization in the spring of 2023 in defense of a drag event at a brewery in Fort Worth, Texas in response to threats from fascist groups.

Chris “Big Tex”

In a message to supporters on the Free Tex website, Chris wrote:

On April 23, 2023 the Fort Worth Police attacked me and beat me for standing on a corner and preventing Nazis from filming people entering a drag show. Hours after my arrest the police in partnership with the elected district attorney spuriously developed a claim that I assaulted them, a claim they did not mention across 24 reports and supplemental reports. The chief integrity officer of the county took a case that spanned 2.5 seconds of my life, to invent the largest of conspiracies: that I am a terrorist, the leader of a criminal street gang, that I paid people to engage in unlicensed security, that cleaning water off my umbrella was a “secret antifa signal,” you name it. She tried to cloud 2.5 seconds with two years of lies and the jury saw through it from the start.

I don’t want to mince words here. We watched for days as cops took the stand to lie, consistently contradicting each other and more wildly often misrepresenting and lying about the very things we were all watching together on screen. We watched as the accusations that Christian-fascists have long levied against me were methodically broken down to the lies they were. Here is an archive of daily trial updates for all four days. Please read, it is impossible to communicate the absurdity to anyone that wasn’t there.

After four full days of enormous tension Tarrant County sealed their fate when they marched a wall of cops into the courtroom to stare down the jury while they read my charge. After less than 45 minutes, I heard those beautiful words: Not Guilty.

I am eternally grateful to my legal team who saw this blatant political persecution for what it was from the start and their ferocious commitment to justice while helping me feel like a person who mattered throughout. I will never forget their righteous anger and commitment to the truth. I am so grateful to my wife and family both blood and chosen, whose unending well of hope and strength pulled me through the darkest days. I am so grateful to the journalist who spent every moment of those long four days in the courtroom alongside my family so my story could be told. And I am so grateful to the Quakers for standing at my side

The current explosion in far-Right demonstrations follows the tragic attack in Southport that took the lives of three young girls and injured multiple other children and adults. Immediately, far-Right disinformation was spread in local Southport chats that alleged the attacker was a Muslim who came over on a small boat crossing, with neo-fascist groups such as Patriotic Alternative (PA) and the British Movement (BM) seeking to inflame tensions.

This disinformation was deliberate, calculated and blatantly parasitic, with the Southport-based nazi David Adams (who is currently active in both PA and BM) entering the local chat to promote PA before promptly leaving.

The riot in Southport saw a police van set on fire outside of a mosque in an attempt to burn it down, and subsequent protests in Hartlepool, Hull, Liverpool and unfortunately Manchester have seen direct attacks on Mosques and Muslims despite the confirmation coming that the attacker was a Christian born in Cardiff to Rwandan parents: everywhere however has seen a dramatic upsurge in racist and fascist violence both around and outside of the demonstrations.

In light of this blatant lie, the far-Right have doubled down on their racism, arguing that it’s no longer even about Southport but a generalized cry to protect the figural women and children from an imagined ‘invasion’ of ‘fighting age males.’ Notably, these demonstrations have been predominantly male, and have seen an alarming amount of youth get sucked into violence through influence from fascist adults that will inevitably lead to criminalization and further radicalization towards the Right.

We therefore understand this movement as having moved past it’s opportunistic parasitic phase, where a tragedy was shamelessly used to propel the fascist movement: it has now entered a period where the fascists no longer ‘need’ Southport, but will reference back to it as part of a wider political ‘justification’ that also includes events, figures and positions like the Romani resistance in Harehills, Tommy Robinson’s supposed ‘persecution’ and deliberately manipulated figures about migrant crime rates.

The media and government’s coverage of these far-Right thugs as ‘protesters’ is a calculated decision to legitimize their ‘concerns’ obscuring the fascistic nature of their views which risks emboldening and normalizing their tactics.

With regards to Manchester on Saturday, we saw the extent of the state’s response to the upsurge in far-Right militancy: Keir Starmer’s new police powers that followed Southport were fully applied to antifascists and ultimately led the GMP to facilitate the violence of the far-Right demonstration.

From the beginning, multiple crowd control pens were set up that neither demonstration entered, and this meant that antifascists spent the entire day kettled by the GMP with helmets, batons and padded gloves ready, alongside intelligence gathering officers and mounted police behind them for any breaks. The GMP were far more concerned with protecting the fascists ‘right’ to march and harass marginalized communities in the centre of Manchester.

In the second half of the day, Hijabs were forcibly removed and Muslim women spat on, whilst crowds chanted “Allah is a pedo:” this was entirely preventable. Our decisions were far from strategically perfect, and we have much reflecting to do, but it must be stated that a policing operation of this size and force was unprecedented in recent years. The far-Right, led by the vaguely unknown Richard Bebbington of Ramsbottom, Bury, were wholly unorganised and it was only through the actions of the police that they managed to gain some sort of unity.

In other attempts to spread their hatred, we responded to information they were planning to ‘protest’ at two migrant hotels in Salford on Friday 3rd, this consisted of 4-6 of them, observing the hotel and police presence from across the road for a few hours before calling it a day. More recently, last night after intelligence that a more confrontational visit was planned to another migrant hotel in greater Manchester, community mobilization saw 120+ antifascists and community members coming in solidarity within an hour of the callout whilst around 15 young lads hung about in the field next door trying to provoke a reaction and ultimately calling it off as another failure. These events show the fragility and unevenness of the far-Right’s current strategy and the importance of community networks and mobilizations in defending against their hatred.

We call on antifascists everywhere to get organized and prepare to physically defend our communities. We especially call for local mobilizations, neighborhood antifascist crews and stronger community links to push the fascists out when they arrive on our doorsteps. The State and the pigs can never keep us safe: if anything, they pose an equal but different threat, and only we can protect us.

Report from Bristol Antifascists from August 3rd:

Yesterday (Saturday 3rd August 2024), Bristol Antifascists joined with antiracist and antifascist groups from Bristol and the South West, along with hundreds of Bristolians, to oppose a far-Right “Stop the Boats” protest.

We want people to understand up front: hundreds of normal Bristolians held the line yesterday against a brutal, sustained assault by fascists trying to attack a hotel housing migrant and asylum seeker families with very young children. The police absolutely failed in their duty to protect

A s London Antifascist Assembly wrote in a recent post to social media:

In less than 24 hours we will all be on the streets in our local areas countering the racist, Islamophobic, fascist threats against London's people. It's still not yet clear how strong the far right presence will be in the majority of the places listed as potential targets for Wednesday evening.

The response from people across London has clearly been massive and the work which we have seen going on in community chats and organizing groups, has been incredible. We will all have to be on our toes tomorrow, as the police will be out in force, desperate to keep people under their thumb. Guides to your legal rights are circulating widely: read them, and be prepared to resist police bullying.

The situation is very chaotic and figuring out which bits of information are accurate, which are made up, and which are exaggerated will be tricky. Rumors of all kinds have been flying all week and tomorrow will see a lot of this. Be wary of misinformation and fascist trolling: Not only is it very easy to misread a situation and accidentally start a rumor, but also the far right will be building on the shock and fear created last weekend by exploiting peoples fears of acid attacks, stabbings, and arson.

Lastly, people going out tomorrow should remember that while organizations are a part of the fight against fascism, no single group or party can ever claim this movement as their prize: You are the ones doing this, you are the ones fighting fascism, and you are the ones who will eventually defeat it. Don't let SWP style figureheads or attention seeking liberal influencers claim leadership in the weeks and months to come.

Good luck tomorrow. The enemy is trying to scare us all into submission, particularly the most marginalised amongst us. Together we must all show them that London is Antifascist.

While these events are taking place in an area that normally isn't covered by It's Going Down, being that the US based far-Right is watching these events very closely, we think it is paramount to not only take note of what is happening, but offer material support and solidarity to communities under attack. Moreover, we know that the demonetization of migrant workers, refugees, and asylum seekers - propelled by online conspiracy theories, policies of both corporate parties, and the mass media - is a core project of those who wish to protect and strengthen entrenched class and racial inequalities which lie at the heart of the capitalist settler-State.

Over the past several decades, we've already seen the militarization of the border, multiple horrific mass shootings by white supremacists under the guise of resisting the "Great Replacement" conspiracy, and elites and corporate media attempting to score political points by manufacturing a fictitious threat of "migrant crime." In short, what happens in England, may soon hit our shores here.

What follows is a collection of reports from anarchist and antifascist groups across the so-called UK, detailing mass community defense in the streets against the far-Right. As the following reports show, antifascist mobilizations, both by community members and organized antifascist groups, have directly saved lives, especially as police have been unwilling and unable to prevent attempts by the far-Right to carry out acts of extreme organized racist violence. For more updates and future reports, be sure to check out the Antifascist Network, Freedom, Red Flare and the Anarchist Federation.

August 2nd

Report from Sunderland from the Northeast Anarchist Group on August 2nd:

The scenes in Sunderland last night were horrific to watch, and the fact that the far-Right think they can be so bold is indicative of much needed antifascist work to be done.

On a slightly more positive note, members of the community and those who helped organise the callout stood in solidarity outside nearby Mosque's and the Sunderland Jami-Masjid, which almost definitely contributed to the far-Right being forced back into the city centre.

There is also a locally organised cleanup happening right now - we can and we will fight back, the police and the fascists are not our friends, only we can protect one another.

August 3rd

Report from Manchester Antifascist Collective from August 3rd:

The events of Saturday 3rd August took place in a climate of rapidly accelerating far-Right militancy. Before we address its specifics, we feel it is worth presenting our analysis of how this militancy has reached an arguably unprecedented level, at least in the last decade.

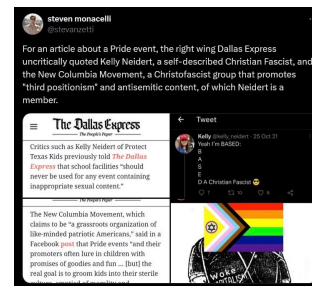

from beginning to end and keeping me level and centered.

I never wanted this to be about me, never wanted the attention or the soapbox, but I'm grateful for all that listened and pleased more than I can articulate to have the next twenty years of my life back.

The real danger has passed, but the lawsuit against me by New Columbia Movement financed by their billionaire donor is still very real and in that suit I am defending myself. I will be back in civil court on August 13th to defend myself once again and as before, the truth will set me free.

I am beset with an overwhelming amount of expenses to recover from two extra days of trial, investigative prep, and expenses related to fighting the civil suit. If you're able to help, please send a few bones my way.

One of the leading bigots who came out to protest the event was Kelly Neidert, a self-described "Christian fascist" who has called for "rounding up" people who attend Pride celebrations and reportedly is a member of the fascist group, the New Columbia Movement. Neidert has organized a variety of anti-LGBTQ+ protests, which have been attended by both Trump supporters and outright neo-Nazi groups that have waved swastika flags. According to the Daily Beast, "Kelly has also received support from former Proud Boys lawyer Jason Lee Van Dyke," who as VICE reported, attempted to join the paramilitary neo-Nazi group the Base, only to be rejected.

Testifying during trial proceedings was Kyle Randle, a former member of the New Columbia Movement, who took part in the far-Right rally outside of the brewery in Fort Worth, TX. According to Alexandra Edwards, who reported from the trial, Kyle is also suing Chris and "his co-plaintiffs are Joshua Finey and Anthony Long... [also former] members of New Columbia [Movement]..."

Edwards went on to report that during the trial, it was revealed that billionaire real estate mogul and Republican mega-donor Monty Bennett, publisher of The Dallas Express is in fact funding the fascist group's lawsuit. Beyond massive donations to Donald Trump and Texas Governor Greg Abbott, Bennett is most well known for swindling tens of millions in PPP loans during the outbreak of the COVID-19 pandemic and pushing a variety of attacks on the LGBTQ+ community and public education.

Members of the New Columbia Movement shake hands with the leader of Patriot Front at an anti-choice rally in DC.

The New Columbia Movement is known for melding European fascism with authoritarian Catholicism and American nationalist symbolism. As Steve Monacelli wrote, the group [embraces a form of "Carlism, a semi-fascist Catholic pro-monarchist ideology, \[that\] emerged in 1800s Spain and played a part in Franco's brutal regime."](#)

A s Political Research Associates reported:

In a manifesto published on its website, the group...calls the notion of equality — or at least what they consider "unnatural equality" — "evil," describes democracy as a "failed experiment" and advocates for a "Roman" model as the solution to "America's cultural diversity," in which "Subjugated peoples" would be allowed to "retain their personal culture," but only under "a High American Culture" based on "Christian morality, rule of law, and the common good."

In YouTube videos, New Columbia Movement leaders have referred to Elliot Rodger, the incel mass shooter who killed six people in Santa Barbara in 2014, as "the supreme gentleman": a self-aggrandizing term Rodger used in his last pre-massacre video, which has since become a common term of endearment on far-right forums like 4chan. Leaders also traffic in antisemitism, as when one leader asserted on a 2021 livestream entitled "The Sexual Revolution and its Consequences" that Jews "do in fact have a very tight stranglehold on the porn industry" as well as "a huge hold on Hollywood." Another leader then added, "This can turn into a 'J.Q.' podcast real fast!" — a reference to the alt-right and neo-Nazi abbreviation for "the Jewish Question." Movement social media posts also regularly denigrate Jewish religious texts such as the Talmud, and one Instagram post captioned an image of ancient Israelite Jews as "the most dangerous enemy in the world."

In the group's first livestream broadcast in July 2020, its co-founders, SK Nicholas Chimera Jr. and Nicholas Haas — both of whom claim to be fourth-degree members of the Catholic fraternal organization Knights of Columbus — detailed their ideological journey to the far right. When the two met in college, Haas explained, SK "was borderline national socialist wignat" — a reference to an online neo-Nazi subculture — and frequented neofascist online forums, while Haas described himself as "basically the definition of a Three Percenter militiaman." SK, who professed his admiration for the former fascist regimes in Italy and Spain, added that "both of our positions lacked God. That's the thing. Once we introduced God into it, we were fine."

Members of the New Columbia

Movement routinely rally alongside neo-Nazi groups which openly flaunt Nazi imagery. Social media posts made by the New Columbia Movement push anti-Semitic conspiracy theories and directly attack Jews. In January of 2024, members of the New Columbia Movement were filmed shaking hands and rallying alongside members of the neo-Nazi group Patriot Front at an anti-abortion march in Washington DC. Patriot Front is a re-brand of Vanguard America, a group which marched in Charlottesville in 2017, where a member of the group murdered antifascist protester Heather Heyer after driving a car into a mass of protesters. Members of Patriot Front have called for “ethno-state rape gangs” and filmed themselves giving Nazi salutes.

Texas Republican Governor Greg Abbott cheers arrest.

The fact that a billionaire capitalist and GOP mega-donor is backing a self-identified fascist group which pushes anti-Semitic conspiracy theories and rallies alongside neo-Nazi groups shows the degree in which the elites want to crush grassroots opposition to their anti-working-class and white supremacist policies.

Bennett’s funding of the New Columbia Movement’s lawsuit is also only the latest example of the Republican Party in Texas having direct links to neo-Nazis and white supremacists. In the fall of 2023, the Texas Tribune reported that “Jonathan Stickland, the ultraconservative leader of a group that has donated millions of dollars to high-profile Texas leaders, hosted prominent white supremacist Nick Fuentes and other right-wing activists [such as Kyle Rittenhouse] for several hours...” In May of this year, Texas governor Greg Abbott also pardoned Daniel Perry, a far-Right Trump supporter found guilty for the murder of “Garret Foster...in Austin, Texas, during a Black Lives Matter demonstration following the police murder of George Floyd in Minneapolis.”

This whole ordeal also exposes how the various forces, ranging from street level fascists, to the governor of Texas who tweeted his praise of the police for arresting Chris, all the way to billionaires like Bennett who are financing a lawsuit for a literal fascist group and employing journalists at the Dallas Express who write pieces attacking antifascists - are all working towards the same goal: crushing communities standing together. It’s up to us to push back, showing that our solidarity is indeed, a weapon.

For more info on how to support Chris in his continued fight in court, go here. Another comrade, Aeshna, is also fundraising for another case stemming from the same protest. More info on how to support here. For more updates on the upcoming lawsuit brought on by the fascist group the New Columbia Movement, go here.

International Gathering of Anarchist and Antiauthoritarian Practices Against Prisons

August 8, 2024

Invitation to international anti-prison gathering in Argentina July 2025.

The importance of these types of gatherings, which lead to international and reproducible agitation, are essential for sharing experiences in the war against domination. To continue the initiative of the International Gathering of Anarchist and Antiauthoritarian Practices against Borders which was organized by compañerxs in Tijuana, Mexico, on this occasion the invitation is to reflect on our practices around the subject of prisons, taking into account the intensity and varied forms in which prisons inhabit us. Necessary to the antiauthoritarian struggle, it is essential to amplify our reflection on prisons and how they not only manifest in a determined time and space, but also how they are embodied in our everyday lives, even in nature and non-human animals.

Extractivism, speciesism, patriarchy, urbanization, punished bodies, coercion, technology, militarism, colonialism, authoritarianism, etc. are just some of the practices that are reproduced inside prisons. We invite individuals, collectives, and other initiatives to share their continued antagonistic reflection and practice against prisons with conversations, contracultural projects, or audio-visual materials, graphics, or performances that relate to a thinking/acting against prisons. The intention is to map the role that prisons currently play in our imaginations, from the collective to the individual. We believe in the necessity to sharpen our ideas and practices, from an ethics of horizontalism, mutual care, self-organization, and autonomy, to confront the hegemony of power, from anarchist anti-authoritarian multiformity and anti-prison internationalism.

Information and a closing date for proposals will be updated as things develop.

Encuentro Internacional de Prácticas Anárquicas y Antiautoritarias Contra las Prisiones

Argentina Julio 2025

Convocatoria

La importancia de este tipo de encuentros que lleven a la agitación internacional y reproducible son esenciales para compartir nuestras experiencias en la guerra contra el dominio. Es por eso que como continuación a la iniciativa del

Encuentro Internacional de Prácticas Anárquicas y Antiautoritarias Contra las Fronteras realizada por compañerxs en Tijuana, México. Se retoma dicha iniciativa en esta ocasión invitando a reflexionar nuestras prácticas en torno a las Prisiones, tomando en cuenta la intensidad y las variadas formas en que las prisiones nos habitan. Pues como necesidad antiautoritaria es esencial ampliar la reflexión en cuanto las prisiones y como estas no sólo se concentran en un espacio o tiempo determinado, sino también estas como encarnan en nuestra cotidianidad hasta en la naturaleza y animales no humanos.

Extractivismo, especismo, patriarcado, urbanismo, cuerpos en castigo, coacción, cárceles, tecnología, militarismo, colonialismo, autoritarismo, etc. Son algunas de las prácticas que se originan dentro de las prisiones. Por ello, convocamos a toda individualidad, colectiva o iniciativa a compartir el continuo reflexionar/prácticas antagónicas contra las prisiones, conversatorios, proyectos kontraculturales, presentaciones de material audiovisual-gráfico-escénico que gire en torno a un pensar/que hacer contra las prisiones. Con el propósito de mapear el papel en que actualmente se encuentran las prisiones en nuestro imaginario, desde lo colectivo a individual. Creemos en la necesidad de afilar nuestras ideas/prácticas, a partir de la horizontalidad, cuidado mutuo, autogestión y autonomía, para enfrentar la hegemonía del poder, desde la multiformidad anárquica antiautoritaria y el internacionalismo anti-carcelario.

UK Communities Mobilize to Defend Themselves as Police Fail to Stop Far-Right Attacks Spurred

by Viral Misinformation

August 6, 2024

Following the tragic murder of three children, a viral campaign of far-Right misinformation pushed by neo-Nazi groups like Patriotic Alternative, far-Right grifters such as Tommy Robinson, and amplified by Elon Musk on Twitter, has led to a series of confrontations between the far-Right and antifascist community members across the so-called United Kingdom.

As the anarchist newspaper Freedom reported:

It was inevitable that the far-Right would exploit the horrific events in Southport. In the aftermath of the attack on a Taylor Swift-themed dance event, in which three children died and others were left in critical condition... Disinformation has swirled around the killings. In the hours after the attack, large social media accounts, including those of right-wing X-ers Andrew Tate and Darren Grimes, stated that the attacker was either an illegal immigrant or a Syrian refugee. However, as far as we know, the UK-born attacker was neither. Other accounts, like the (literally) fake news site Channel 3 Now, were cited by conspiracy theorists and used to call for martial law and mass deportations...Today’s far right is not dominated by one group. Instead, we saw an amorphous network of conspiracy theorists, anti-migrant activists, explicit fascists and hooligans mobilise from across the country.

Despite communities quickly mobilizing in the face of far-Right violence, racist mobs have taken to the streets “throwing bricks, setting fires, smashing windows, threatening mosques and attacking hotels housing asylum seekers” In one city, white supremacist rioters even set up check points to check the race of motorists passing through an area. In two horrifying instances, racist rioters set fire to hotels housing migrants, in an attempt to literally burn them alive.

As Hope Not Hate reported:

Sunday 4 August witnessed two arson attempts on sites of temporary asylum accommodation. One was in Rotherham, where close to 1,000 protesters overwhelmed a seemingly ill-prepared South Yorkshire Police Force before pushing a wheelie bin inside and setting it alight. The other was in Tamworth, where a mob stormed a Holiday Inn and torched the hallway, and sprayed racist slogans such as “fuck ps” and “get out England” on the building.

In addition to Southport and Hartlepool earlier in the week, Rotherham, Sunderland, Hull, Stoke, Liverpool, Middlesbrough and Tamworth endured the worst of the violence...Bristol, too, saw ugly scenes as anti-fascists bravely positioned themselves between far-right thugs and the entrance to a hotel which was being used to temporarily house asylum seekers.

Elsewhere, other far-right demonstrations either failed to materialise or were dwarfed by antifascist counter-demonstrators. In the end, the far right were either heavily outnumbered or failed to show in: Cardiff, Doncaster, Wrexham, Swindon, Nottingham, Preston, Leicester, Torquay and High Wycombe, among others.

This week, following initial clashes, community defenders are organizing to hold the streets against continued calls by far-Right and neo-Nazi groups to violently target and attack “immigration-related charities, advice centres and solicitors,” and there are signs that more far-Right demonstrations are being organized in the near future
